Accompanying the letter is a petition [exhibiting] on which are the original signatures copied on oil paper of these distinguished men in the State of California, 12 of whom were upon the campaign committee of the Senator from California. As

I say, I do not blame the Senator for wishing to delay matters in the Senate until he can get back to California and make his "title clear to mansions in the—political—sky." I ask unanimous consent that this memorial and the signatures thereto be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial, together with the signatures, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate:

The executive committee of the California branch of the League to Enforce Peace believes it essential to secure a responsible expression of opinion relating to the league of nations.

This Nation, which has done so much to promote the principle of the peaceful settlement of international disputes, can not justly be placed in an attitude of hostility to the project adopted by the conference at Paris for the extension of that principle to all the associated nations for the purpose of averting all preventable wars.

The undersigned urge that the treaty containing the peace covenant be promptly ratified by the Senate without attempting to embarrass it by amendment, thus delaying the conclusion of peace and the establishment of a great agency for its future preservation.

Mr. LODGE. The motion which I made on September 23 was:

I move that this amendment be postponed until this day week.

That motion prevailed. I then said:

I have no desire to put it an unreasonable distance, and I ask unanimous consent to change the time from one week to three days hence, and let it apply to all these amendments.

That was agreed to. There was no agreement about a vote. It was simply an agreement to postpone the consideration of the amendments and take them up at a later time.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. The very question put by the Vice President was this:

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone the consideration of this amendment for one week.

Mr. LODGE. I think there can be no question about it.

Mr. President, I suggested to the Senator from Nebraska this morning that it would save time if the Secretary would read the remainder of part 3, which will cover all the amendments known as the Fall amendments. If we do not do that, but proceed with the consideration immediately of the amendments which have been read, of course the remaining amendments will have to be read by whoever is discussing them, and there will be involved the necessity of reading them a second time. I think, therefore, time will be saved if the treaty is read up to part 4 and then the Senator from New Mexico or other Senators who desire to discuss the Fall amendments will have an opportunity to do so, if that is agreeable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not the Senator's understanding that the discussion of these amendments will immediately follow the reading, and that the matter will remain before the Senate until voted upon?

Mr. LODGE. That is my understanding; that we shall consider, discuss, and dispose of these amendments.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not understand that the discussion will be confined to these amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Of course not.

Mr. BORAH. It will be a discussion of the treaty, but not necessarily of these amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. There is no agreement to that effect, and there will not be any made to that effect.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Idaho by that desire to prevent coming to a vote on the Fall amendments?

Mr. BORAH. Not necessarily, but I do not propose to confine my remarks to those particular amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that there is no power to confine the remarks of Senators, but I had hoped that in good faith we could carry out within a reasonable time, as I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts desires to carry out, the settlement of these amendments when they are reached.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. That is my intention. I hope that they will be considered and discussed within a reasonable time; but, of course, the method which shall be employed by any Senator in discussing any question must be left to him. Yesterday when the treaty was before the Senate some time was occupied in discussing Mr. Burleson's management of the Post Office Department. My only intention was to get the amendments before the Senate as soon as possible, Friday being the day set for their consideration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The reading of the portion of the treaty which the Senator has indicated, including all of the Fall amendments——

Mr. LODGE. That will include all of the Fall amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will be concluded in a short time; and I am perfectly willing to proceed with the reading until the portion of the text embracing the Fall amendments has all been read.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does that mean that we go back to the Fall amendments when we are through with the reading?

Mr. LODGE. That is the desire—to have them all read before they are discussed.

Mr. McCUMBER. We will not go back to the first amendment, but to the Fall amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. As the Senator knows, the so-called Fall amendments are all practically one amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the understanding, then, that the reading shall be proceeded with.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before any Senator takes the floor I offer two brief letters from a distinguished clergyman of Brooklyn, which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested:

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITY CHURCH, THIRD UNITARIAN,
Brooklyn, N. Y., September 24, 1919.

Senator LODGE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to commend you for your fight to add amendments and reservations to the league covenant and the peace treaty. Personally I know of very few people who do not stand with you in this.

Heretofore I have been an ardent champion of the league of nations and have spoken in its behalf. I still believe in the principle of a league, but not in this as it stands. I am convinced that as it now stands it will not prevent war but make war inevitable. To-day I am resigning from the Brooklyn League of Nations Committee of which I have been a member. I inclose a copy of my letter to this committee.

Rev. JOSEPH A. KYLE.

UNITY CHURCH, THIRD UNITARIAN,
Brooklyn, N. Y., 24 September, 1919.

BROOKLYN LEAGUE OF NATIONS COMMITTEE,
32 Court Street, Brooklyn.

DEAR SIRS: I have received your communication asking me to write to Senator CALDER in regard to the amendments and reservations reported by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. I am sorry that I can not do so, and feel that I ought to withdraw from the Brooklyn League of Nations Committee. Will you kindly strike my name from your list?

I can no longer with clear conscience support the league of nations covenant unless it can be radically amended and wholly severed from the peace treaty. I know of very few people who do not feel as I do about it. As the league covenant and the treaty now stand, they make war inevitable rather than impossible.

There is no doubt that some form of league is needed and will ultimately come. I still believe in the principle and will do what I can for it; but I am so disappointed by the glaring contrast between the beautiful words of President Wilson and what he has actually accomplished that I do not care to have any further connection with a committee that works in support of the present covenant.

Sincerely, yours,

Rev. JOSEPH A. KYLE.

THE STEEL WORKERS' STRIKE.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to occupy a few minutes of the attention of the Senate on another subject. I have no desire to interfere with the progress of the peace treaty, but another matter has been called to my attention which I believe to be of the very highest importance at this particular time.

On Tuesday of this week Hon. JOHN G. COOPER, a Member of Congress from the Youngstown, Ohio, district, made a speech in the other House in which he called attention to one William Z. Foster, who is organizing the steel workers of the country. If Senators have not read the speech of Mr. COOPER, I hope they will do so. In my judgment, Mr. COOPER rendered a splendid service to the cause of law and order in making that speech at this opportune time.

I was told a few minutes ago that Mr. Gompers appeared before the committee of the Senate presided over by the distinguished junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], which is now investigating the steel strike, and that in his testimony Mr. Gompers was asked about Mr. Foster. As I understand, Mr. Gompers admitted that Foster had been an I. W. W. and a syndicalist, but claimed that he had since reformed.

I have before me a copy of the Christian Science Monitor of Thursday, September 25 of this year. In a news article sent from Chicago this statement appears:

In a letter published in Solidarity, the official organ of the I. W. W., on November 4, 1911, William Z. Foster, secretary of the national committee for organizing iron and steel workers, urged the I. W. W. to work within the American Federation of Labor to make it a revolutionary organization. Mr. Foster at this time was a member of the I. W. W. and a candidate for editor of another I. W. W. publication, the Industrial Worker, at Seattle, Wash. His advocacy of "boring from within" the trade-union movement did not please the I. W. W. membership and caused his defeat.

I will not read the whole article; but the writer says:

This letter appears in the files of Solidarity at the office of the United States district attorney in Chicago. It reads, in part, as follows:

"I am satisfied from my observation that the only way for the I. W. W. to have the workers adopt and practice the principles of revolutionary unionism—which I take is its mission—is to give up the attempt to create a new labor movement, turn itself into a propaganda league, get into the organized labor movement, and by building up better fighting machines within the old unions than those possessed by our reactionary enemies, revolutionize these unions, even as our French syndicalist fellow workers have so successfully done with theirs."

This letter was signed "Yours, for revolution, William Z. Foster."

And now this man, with that record, which he himself wrote in 1911, is parading himself before the public as one of the friends of labor! God help labor when it gets into the clutches of men of that type!

I have before me a copy of the pamphlet which was issued by Earl C. Ford and William Z. Foster—this same William Z. Foster—and has printed upon the front page, "Published by William Z. Foster, 1000 South Paulina Street, Chicago." I am going to read a paragraph or two from it. He believed in direct action, he believed in sabotage, and he discusses approvingly sabotage. I am not going to read all he says on that subject, but I want to read a paragraph or two:

The most widely known form of sabotage is that known as "putting the machinery on strike." The syndicalist goes on strike to tie up industry. If his striking fails to do this, if strike breakers are secured to take his place, he accomplishes his purpose by "putting the machinery on strike" through temporarily disabling it. If he is a railroader he cuts wires, puts cement in switches, signals, etc., runs locomotives into turntable pits, and tries in every possible way to temporarily disorganize the delicately adjusted railroad system. If he is a machinist or factory worker, and hasn't ready access to the machinery, he will hire out as a scab and surreptitiously put emery dust in the bearings of the machinery or otherwise disable it. Oftentimes he takes time by the forelock, and when going on strike "puts the machinery on strike" with him by hiding, stealing, or destroying some small indispensable machine part which is difficult to replace. As is the case with all direct-action tactics, even conservative workers when on strike naturally practice this form of sabotage—though in a desultory and unorganized manner. This is seen in their common attacks on machines, such as street cars, automobiles, wagons, etc., manned by scabs.

Now, note their method of treating "scabs." I read from page 14 of this pamphlet:

The scab. A large portion of the syndicalists' success in their strikes is due to their energetic treatment of the strikebreaker. According to syndicalist ethics, a poverty-stricken workingman, in his predicament, can do anything save scab. He may beg, borrow, steal, starve, or commit suicide, and still retain the friendship and esteem of his fellow workers; but let him take the place of a striker and he immediately outlaws himself. He becomes so much vermin, to be ruthlessly exterminated. The French syndicalists are especially merciless toward scabs. They are making strikebreaking such a dangerous profession that scabs are becoming pleasingly scarce and expensive. They literally hunt scabs as they would wild animals. This war on scabs is popularly known as "La chasse aux renards." (The fox chase.)

Senators will please note that William Z. Foster, in his position as an organizer of the steel men, seems to be following out the program so clearly set forth in his letter which I read a few moments ago. He is an I. W. W., as appears from the reading of his letter. He favored having the workers "adopt and practice the principles of labor unionism." He has gotten into "the organized labor movement." He is now where, to use his own words, he can "by building up better fighting machines within the old unions than those possessed by our reactionary enemies, revolutionize these unions, even as our French syndicalist fellow workers have so successfully done with theirs."

What a leader for law-abiding labor!

Senators, I do not think I am a pessimist. I am an optimist, but I am not underestimating the seriousness of present conditions.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber. Let me ask the Senator what he was reading from.

Mr. POMERENE. I was reading from the pamphlet called "Syndicalism," by Earl C. Ford and William Z. Foster. But with this feeling of unrest prevailing as it is to-day, for men of the type of Foster—who has no respect either for the law of God or the law of man—to be placed at the head of a labor organization, or a movement in the interest of labor, shocks one's reason. All that men of that kind can do or will do is to ruin the cause of labor.

The vast majority of the laboring men, as the vast majority of all men and women, are law-abiding; but when they are controlled by leaders of this kind, what can you expect but the destruction of property? And when we arrive at a time when property is not safe, life itself is not safe.

Now, Senators, when I recall the fact that the entire resources of this country were mobilized so that a military autocrat should not control the destinies of the world, I am satisfied that that same people will see to it that an autocrat of the type of Foster shall not long control the actions of even a few laboring men. I hope that when Senators and the public generally are trying to determine what should be done in this great industrial crisis they shall bear in mind the character of man who is now one of their leaders.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand two interviews, one coming from Paderewski, the president of the new Polish Republic, in which he pleads for the league of peace to rescue Poland, declaring that it is essential to the maintenance of the independence of his people. The other is from Mr. Morgenthau, late our ambassador to Turkey, in which he states that he sees Germany strong for another war, preparing for it now; in which he says that she came through this war a perfect dynamo of strength, her human military strength as great as ever. He calls attention to the fact of the rapid demobilization of the forces of the entente, including our own and those of Great Britain, and to the danger of spending time in useless discussion while Germany is gathering together her forces, stiffening her sinews, and summoning up her courage for a new struggle.

I ask unanimous consent for the insertion in the RECORD of the two articles.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 19, 1919.]

PLEADS FOR LEAGUE TO RESCUE POLAND—PADEREWSKI DECLARES THAT IT IS ESSENTIAL TO THE INDEPENDENCE OF HIS PEOPLE—FIGHT INSPIRED BY AMERICA—PREMIER WANTS MORAL AND ECONOMIC SUPPORT, RATHER THAN MILITARY HELP.

"WARSAW, September 18.

"President Paderewski, of the council of ministers of Poland, declared to-day that the league of nations was essential to Polish independence. In a statement he said:

"'From a Polish point of view our one hope of future security as a State lies in the league of nations. Upon it—and I fear upon it alone—depends the liberty of the Polish people and the successful development of democratic and liberal government in Poland. Standing, as we are, between Germany on one side and Russia on the other, we can not hope to maintain our integrity during these years, while we build up the strength of our people, unless we have the protection of the league.

"'Poland at the present moment has 500,000 men under arms. Our people are short of food supplies, short of clothing, short of many of the necessities of life. We are compelled to make every sacrifice to sustain the army, and this with our population needing its resources for the upbuilding of the nation, in order that we may protect ourselves from encroachment.

"'To-day we are defending 1,500 miles of front against Bolshevist forces, and, in so doing, we stand as the front line in Europe against Bolshevist invasion from the east.

"'We are endeavoring to maintain this front line and at the same time to achieve an economic stability, to recuperate our people from the effects of repeated invasions of German and Russian armies. The task is a terrible one. The tax upon our strength will be too great unless we can have the assurance that there will be a body in the world to whom we can appeal for aid in the righting of our wrongs.

"'Poland has set up a democracy under the inspiration of the American people. Had it not been for American intervention in Europe we might possibly have had some semblance of independent government under an autocratic overrule, but with American intervention and American help we have sought to establish not only the independence of the State but also the internal liberty of our people through the difficult road of democracy.

"'The pressure is upon us on all sides through military action and through Bolshevist propaganda, and an intense propaganda from Germany. Unless we have a protective power in the world, under whose strength we can secure an opportunity for peaceful development and the solution of our internal problems, free from distracting and antagonistic influences, I fear for the safety of our democracy.

"'The world has but little realization of the immensity of the problems with which we have had to cope. Large sections of Poland, which has been ravaged, are being brought back to fertility; in addition, we have the replacement of populations, now congested in the cities, upon the agricultural lands of the State.

"'We have been obliged to devote energy to supplying our railroads with rolling stock, of which they were denuded. Free access to the sea is as yet denied us, and our coal supply has been cut off, in spite of the immense majority of the Polish population in the Duchy of Teschen.

"'Yet the Polish people are firm in their resolve to make any sacrifice for the firm establishment of their State. There is, however, a degree of sacrifice that no people can reach and still endure, even though the alternatives to which they turn may be even more disastrous. We can not be expected to build a great and stable State and to protect ourselves from Bolshevist on one side and German reaction on the other unless we can have the background of a great moral protecting power that will furnish us the opportunity of solving our difficulties.

"'The great power and the support which it may furnish need not be military; its moral and economic force is all that we ask, and that power is the league of nations.'"

[From the New York Times, Sept. 20, 1919.]

MORGENTHAU SEES GERMANY STRONG FOR ANOTHER WAR—CENTRAL EUROPEAN STRIFE, HE WARNS, WILL ENCOURAGE NEW RESORT TO ARMS—MAY GOBBLE UP RUSSIA—AND SHE WOULD FIND WARRING SMALL NEW NATIONS AN EASY PREY—HIS SOLE HOPE IN LEAGUE—NEWLY CREATED POWERS MUST BE ASSURED OF JUSTICE WITHOUT ENGAGING IN WARS.

"PARIS, September 19.

"'Germany came through this war a perfect dynamo of strength. Her human military power is practically as great as ever, and her 65,000,000 people have been schooled and hardened by trials. They have learned economy and self-denial.

"'The nation has been compressed into a concentrated mass, which is surcharged with energy and moving with centripetal force, while Germany's neighbors are spreading themselves out thin and quarreling and moving with centrifugal force.'

"Thus spoke Henry Morgenthau, who headed the United States commission of investigation which has been at work in Poland, in discussing to-day his observations in Central Europe.

"'And what will be the result?' Mr. Morgenthau asked. Replying to his question, he continued:

"'If disintegration keeps up among Germany's neighbors, there can be but one result. I doubt whether Germany fully appreciates her own strength. As she sits, calmly watching the dickering going on between the new States, which are losing sight of great principles and fighting over little strips of territory, she must take grim satisfaction in the battle her enemies are waging in her behalf. And a Germany encouraged by such discord among weak and struggling States undoubtedly will resort to arms within a few years and regain her lost territory.

"'What will prevent the military clique from regaining control in Germany if Europe continues to offer such tempting prizes to various nationalities? Such a situation will not encourage Germany to regain her trade by peaceful means and to pay indemnities. It will not satisfy the militarists of Germany to return to the factories if their war-worn neighbors weaken themselves further and deliberately offer themselves as prey to the Prussian spirit.

"'What is to encourage the democrats in Germany who are trying to get away from militarism? Europe is rapidly driving on toward a situation which eventually must result in a coalition between Russia and Germany and the absolute destruction of many of the newly created powers unless steps be taken to prevent it.

"'Opinion is strong that the league of nations is the only means for preventing such a disaster. And it must come soon and have the loyal support of both great and small powers. Greece, Italy, Jugoslavia, Czechoslavakia, Poland, and other European countries which have been fought over and are in a sadly weakened condition need the support of some organization which will afford them the proper tribunal for their disputes and assist them in winning their publics away from the idea that war is the only means of getting justice.

"'It is impossible to create barrier States against Bolshevism and militarism, and if these new States continue their quarrels and weaken themselves they can not resist any enemy, much less a great untouched power like Germany.

"'Germany intelligently refused to fight to a finish with the United States. She withdrew in good order to a place of safety, where the war had not ruined her factories and where everything was ready for the resumption of peace industry.

"'Germany has gone to work, but work is impossible in many of those districts where the Germans destroyed machinery and the people have not the raw materials with which to work. But these ruined countries must not make Germany's economic restoration easier by fighting among themselves and leaving Germany the world market without competition.

"'The forces of peace must organize and consolidate; otherwise they are inviting an onslaught which German arms unquestionably will make within a few years unless Germany's enemies intrench themselves through constructive work and establish the nations which threaten to weaken themselves and their allies through greed and jealousy.

"'Germany has gone over into Russia. Her people are organizing there, and they will marshal Russian resources and utilize them in combating the rest of the world, unless a strong Poland is created as a protection for Europe.

"'With her great industrial resources and wonderful railway systems dominating Central Europe, Germany is in a very fortunate position. She is strong and virile, and capable of great commercial and military effort. Nations like Italy, Greece, Roumania, and Jugoslavia, which are extending their territory and spreading out in all directions, have not the industries to bring them that which makes Germany powerful. Furthermore, they are, in many cases, trying to swallow up peoples of different races and aspiration. They are trying to govern more than they can handle.

"'Germany will leave France alone, perhaps, but she inevitably will try to gobble up Russia and many of the small countries of Central Europe.

"'The task of the United States is clear. She must begin, through her allies, she must equip statesmen in the international school and create the first general staff that has ever existed, so as to have leaders who will realize what the world developments are.

"'An America which is ready, mentally and physically, to stand behind the league of nations can hold the balance of power in the world. If the United States does not measure up to its responsibilities, Germany may win the next time and secure domination of the world.'"

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I understand that a few moments ago, when I was absent from the Chamber, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] read into the RECORD, or presented for insertion in the RECORD, a petition or a letter or a memorial which had been addressed to me from various gentlemen in California. In the course of the presentation of this statement or memorial the Senator from Mississippi made the statement, as I am informed—not being present I relate it as the information conveyed to me—to the effect that the reason of the trip that I contemplate this afternoon is obvious; that it is to mend political fences of mine in the State of California, because certain gentlemen who signed this memorial or petition are gentlemen who have been connected with me politically in the past, are connected with me politically at present, and who will be, notwithstanding the memorial, connected with me, I trust, politically in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the Senator is not trying to quote verbatim et literatim what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am simply stating what I was told. I was not here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that the Senator's reason for going was as stated, but I said that when I read that he was going I surmised that there was good occasion for him to go for that reason.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. A surmise, Mr. President, which I think is very natural in the Senator from Mississippi. I recognize that the Senator from Mississippi would be unable to comprehend adequately that I am going into the State of California, and I am going into every other State that I can reach in the United States, not to mend any political fences of mine, or any political fences at all, but I am going there because of an optimism which I think the Senator from Mississippi is utterly unable to comprehend, a faith in the common people of this land. I am certain, Mr. President, that when the common people of this land, just common folks, whom the Senator from Mississippi can not perhaps wholly understand, hear the story of the league of nations, understand what it portends, realize the meaning of the mystic utterances that have been made recently concerning it, these common folk of America will respond as Americans for America and in an American spirit. The purpose of the trip I intend to take is to preach, with the poor abilities that I have, and as best I am able, that doctrine of Americanism.

Mr. President, I might advert, did I desire to do so, to a petition received by me from the State of Mississippi some month or more ago, signed by various citizens of that State, against a league of nations, and mentioning the senior Senator from Mississippi. I refrain from putting that particular petition in the RECORD.

I might advert, as well, to the fact that recently there was a political contest in the State of Mississippi, and in that contest, as I am informed, one of the issues was whether or not the league of nations should be adopted by our country. I do not know the facts; I have only been informed in that regard; that upon that issue the people of Mississippi announced their position without any doubt and in no uncertain tones. I may be in error in my information in that regard. I state it as hearsay, and hearsay alone.

But what the Senator from Mississippi does not comprehend, and can not comprehend, is that men may have a difference of opinion upon an academic or a governmental question and still may fight side by side politically in the present and politically in the future. In the State from which I come, Mr. President, it is not necessary for a man to be a servant to power or to crawl to one who holds a great position at present in order to be an American citizen or a member of a political party. In the State from which I come men differ on some political matters, on certain governmental questions, and yet fight together upon other governmental questions, and the politics of the matter enters not into the issue in any way, shape, or manner. There is no politics so far as this question is concerned, I trust, in the State of California, any more than I have been moved by any politics concerning the league of nations. There is only one motive which stirs me, and that is to do what I think I ought to do in a great crisis, in a great conjuncture of this country.

I am going to California, I am going to Colorado, I am going to Nevada, I am going to Oregon, I am going to Washington, I am going to Utah, if I have time to go to all those States, and I am going to talk as best I can. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the people of those States want to hear the facts, and if Congress did what it ought to do in the present situation that confronts it it would for a brief period let every man get out of the atmosphere of Washington and go among the common people and try the issue among the people, who are entitled to know what is to be done with them and their children after them.

I am going to try to preach the amendment that I have presented, which is the amendment that will be last voted on, I understand. In this discussion and upon this particular argument I want to explain, if I am able to, that the United States of America, by the document that is presented here, is given a disproportionate representation, which challenges a man's self-respect who is an American and which affronts an American's patriotism.

I want to explain, if I am able to explain, to our people that an instrument is presented to us in this Chamber which gives to one great power in this world six votes in the assembly and to us but one vote in the assembly. When it is sought to explain that away by saying it is of little or no consequence, the inquiry at once arises in every American's mind if it is not of any consequence that Great Britain shall have six votes and that we shall have one, why in the name of common sense and Americanism did not the President of the United States come back here bringing America six votes and Great Britain one vote? If it is not of any importance, Mr. President, that Great Britain should be given six times the voting power the United States of America is given by this league, then why was it so necessary that the British Empire should insist upon those six votes?

A lachrymose appeal was made the other day by the President in regard to the sacrifices of Canada, Australia, and the like. He said that across the sea he could not tell the difference between Americans and Australians except by their hats, or words of that character. Of course, Canada and Australia sacrificed in this war. Of course, we recognize those sacrifices, and we yield to them the full meed of praise for patriotic duty well done.

But, Mr. President, the amendment which is presented here, which I had the honor to propose, recognizes Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and even India. It gives them their votes within the league exactly as they are given under this particular league that is presented to us. It enables them to be members of the league, to vote within the assembly, and to do all that members of the league can do. The amendment only says, not that Canada shall be deprived of a vote, not that Australia shall be deprived of a vote, nor New Zealand, nor South Africa; it just says that America is big enough, powerful enough, and rich enough, America is good enough, to have just as many votes as the British Empire. That is the amendment; not that we deprive any other territory, any other entity, in this league of a vote at all. We merely equalize the voting power by giving the United States of America exactly the same number of votes that we give the Empire of Great Britain.

Mr. President, it starts with one vote for the British Empire, and then a vote for each fraction of the British Empire. There is no more reason for giving those votes to the fractions than there would be for giving a vote to the State of New York. But that has been done, and written in the constitution of the league. So we would not deprive the British colonies of the power, the rights, and the privileges to membership accorded by the league. We simply, out of our regard for our own Nation, make our vote equal to theirs. And when the President asserts that it is a matter of little consequence and of no importance he is not frank with the people. Not alone is it of importance in one matter, but it is important in at least a dozen matters. Not alone does this voting power in the assembly touch the membership of the council, it touches every question concerning the peace of the world which may be dealt with either by the council or by the assembly. The assembly touches every important problem within the jurisdiction of the league of nations, and touching thus every important problem within the jurisdiction of the league of nations the voting power within the assembly becomes of transcendent importance. Under the voting power that is accorded the members of the league in the assembly—I repeat and repeat and repeat—Great Britain has six votes, and the United States has one vote.

I returned here from Minneapolis the other night, after a rather extended tour, in the endeavor to present what was in my mind upon this question. I came back here in the hope that I would be able to get a vote upon this particular amendment. I found on consultation, not alone with Senators on one side but Senators on the other, that it was impossible and that my amendment was relegated to the end of this entire debate. Being relegated to the end of the entire debate, I am resuming what I left off at Minneapolis the other night, the tour that was interrupted, and I am going forward with the idea of presenting as best I can that which is in my heart and in my mind.

Mr. President, this voting power in this instrument is the most important matter with which we have to deal. If you give a preponderance of voting power over ours to any nation, you place us in just that degree in the power of that particular nation and under that particular nation's sway.

The answer is made to me that other nations are not given six votes as well. That is true. France is not. Italy is not. Japan is not. But I am not concerned, Mr. President, with France, or with Italy, or with Japan, or with any other country. I am concerned not with Great Britain, with which some gentlemen are concerned alone; I am concerned with the United States of America, and I want the United States of America to have her equal voting power even with the British Empire.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it was quite characteristic of the Senator from California that he should immediately find some high place for which he was particularly fitted and which in his opinion I could not even approach. Of course, I do not place myself upon the platform upon which the Senator from California places himself. I admit a great many deficiencies of reasoning power and a great deal of inability to see clearly and completely a great many things. Yet, Mr. President, I shall be somewhat astonished to find anything in the world which the Senator from California, in his objective though not in his subjective form, could understand and which I could not.

Amongst other things that he thought he understood was the situation in the State of Mississippi, and he makes the assertion, "upon information," as he is kind enough to inform us, that the league of nations entered into the recent fight in Mississippi. In the first place, it was not a victory for either side, as the Senator seems to think. There are two factions in the Democratic Party down there. One faction elected the legislature and all the State officers except the governor and the lieutenant governor, and the faction to which he refers elected the governor and the lieutenant governor. In the second place, the league of nations did not enter, in the most remote manner, into the fight at all. It was a fight upon the State administration. In the third place, when the league of nations did enter into politics in the State of Mississippi, it was when my colleague was running against my former colleague, when it became a live issue, and my colleague defeated my former colleague principally upon that issue.

So much for the Senator's ignorance—I beg the Senator's pardon—the Senator's lack of accurate information concerning what has occurred in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. President, the Senator refers to the six votes which Great Britain has in the assembly and the one vote which we have. In the first place, Great Britain has not six votes in the assembly. Great Britain has one, Canada has one, Australia has one, New Zealand has one, South Africa has one, and India has one. These are all self-governing Commonwealths under the agencies of the civilization of the great Anglo-Saxon race, except——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Is India a self-governing Commonwealth?

Mr. WILLIAMS. India is a self-governing Commonwealth in this sense [laughter in the galleries]——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wants the doorkeepers to carry out the orders of the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether the occupants of the galleries were applauding the Senator's inquiry or whether they were applauding my response. In either event——

The VICE PRESIDENT. They were disobeying the rules of the Senate. The rules are either going to be enforced or they are going to be repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not talking about that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair is talking about.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Vice President, of course, is right in saying that the rules of the Senate ought either to be repealed or obeyed. Upon the day before yesterday, I believe, I am informed, though I was not present, a voice in the galleries, packed as the galleries have been for some time by the local union of "the Friends of Irish Freedom," called out, when a Senator of the United States was speaking from the floor, "Put him out." The rules of the Senate were not then obeyed, and the man who made that call ought to have been put out himself. If the occupants of the gallery failed to give the offender's name, the galleries ought to have been cleared. That was the time to assert the dignity of the Senate and of the Chair, and nothing was done.

Mr. President, I have no objection to applause in the galleries. As I said the other day, I think the Senate rule in that respect is foolish. The House has no such rule and gets along very well without it. However, even the House, with the greatest possible latitude in that regard, never allows hissing from the galleries and never allows people in the galleries to suggest that a Member be put out, in ignorance of the fact that a Member can not be put out except by a vote of expulsion, which requires a two-thirds vote. But if that sort of thing goes on, the hissing and cries of "Put him out," as in the case of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], it will not be long before a mob in the galleries will be putting motions, as they did in the French revolutionary convention, and participating in the action of this body, and will be forming, by their own election, a part of the body which the people have a right to elect and have elected.

But this has nothing to do with the argument. To come back to the argument: Great Britain has not six votes even in the assembly. She has one vote. Canada has one vote, Australia has one, New Zealand has one. South Africa has one, and India has one. All these are, as I was about to say when interrupted, self-governing Commonwealths except India, and India has a separate provincial government, although it is more closely allied to the British Empire's Government than are the governments of the other provinces. Not only is that true, but it has been recognized during the war that Canada and these other self-governing provinces had to declare war upon Germany before they were at war with Germany, and each one of them must make peace with Germany as parties to the general treaty before it will be at peace with Germany. Great Britain has long since recognized the independence, internationally speaking, of these self-governing Commonwealths. The Parliament of Great Britain has no right to declare a state of war into which she drags them nolens volens. They have a right to sit in judgment and pass upon the question as to whether they shall go to war or not. Having that right, it is right that they should have a voice, although in no true sense a vote, in connection with the operations of the league of peace. I say a voice, because the general assembly of the league, in which they have representation, votes upon very few subjects at all, and even upon subjects where it does vote, the concurrence or agreement of the council is needed before it becomes binding, and the council votes by unanimous consent.

The President has answered fully every word that the Senator from California has said here to-day, and every word which he or anybody else has said on this subject at any other time. Great Britain's colonies, together with Great Britain, have in the assembly each a vote, but upon the council the Empire alone has a vote, and it is the council alone which controls the great and stupendous questions which will face the world as coming through the league of nations. The general assembly of the league can not decide anything except by unanimous vote—ours being one—except questions of procedure, adjournment, and so forth. Admission to representation on the council must be by unanimous vote—ours being one.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. As has been well said, if there be six voices with only one vote, it is no stronger than one voice with one vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will in a moment.

Doubtless, had we requested to have delegates in the assembly representing the South and the Northeast and the Middle West and the Pacific States, I suppose they would have allowed us to have them; but nobody wanted it because, unlike the Empire of Great Britain, we do not allow the different parts of our imperial domain to sit in judgment upon questions of peace and war or upon questions of tariff, or upon any other national question.

Moreover, Mr. President, this provision adds five votes to the influence throughout the world of Anglo-Saxonism or Anglo-Celticism, as some people prefer to call it, and as I do myself—liberty-loving, liberty-conquering people, who have acquired liberty and transmitted it to the balance of the world; and the United States, so far from being weakened by giving a voice in the assembly to the great free States of South Africa, to the great progressive future Empire of Australia, to our good neighbor and friend who would agree with us oftener than with Great Britain, especially upon American questions, Canada, are strengthened by it.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Can Canada and Australia become members of the council?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Any Australian or any Canadian can become a member of the council, but Great Britain can have but one representative on the council, no matter from what part of the confederacy of self-governing British Commonwealths that representative may come. I have seen all that correspondence which the Senator has in mind, and that is all it means and all it is intended to mean. The Senator is referring to the Clemenceau-Lloyd George agreement.

Of course, Jan Smuts could have been the British representative upon the council, because South Africa could, as a part of the British confederacy, have a representative. A South African would be eligible for a place upon the council, a Canadian would be eligible, but the agreement in the treaty says, in so many words, that the so-called "Empire" of Great Britain shall have one representative on the council, and it says only one, and the naming of the whole includes its parts, and therefore the parts of Great Britain all taken together can have but one vote on the council; but that one may come from any part of the British Empire.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that Great Britain or the British Empire could not have a vote upon the council and that also Canada at the same time could have a vote upon the council?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; on the contrary, I say either can, and that both at the same time can not.

Mr. BORAH. Is that the contention of the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What you said or what I said?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that Canada and the British Empire, or Great Britain, may not at the same time have members of the council?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely. I know exactly what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] is showing the Senator from Idaho, and that is all the correspondence means, and that is what it said.

Mr. MOSES. Let it be read and let us see.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Has the Senator from Mississippi any objection to having read the letter by Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George, and President Wilson?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, indeed. How did the Senator get the idea that I had?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator from Idaho read the letter?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

The question having been raised as to the meaning of article 4 of the league of nations covenant, we have been requested by Sir Robert Borden to state whether we concur in his view that upon the true construction of the first and second paragraphs of that article representatives of the self-governing dominions of the British Empire may be selected or named as members of the council. We have no hesitation in expressing our entire concurrence in this view. If there were any doubt it would be entirely removed by the fact that the articles are not subject to a narrow or technical construction.

(Signed) G. CLEMENCEAU.
WOODROW WILSON.
D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

Mr. President, it will be recalled, if the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I merely want to make one observation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. It will be recalled that ex-President Taft proposed an amendment to the effect that the self-governing dominions should never be permitted to have membership upon the council. Immediately that gave rise to debate in the Canadian Parliament, the premier of Canada insisting that Canada would have a right as a separate and distinct entity to have her own representative on the council; and he stated very explicitly that, if that was not to be true, Canada would not be very greatly interested in the league of nations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, had ex-President Taft's idea been adopted, if it had been provided that they should never have a representative upon the council, it would have been very unjust to Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand, because the time is not so very far in the future, as history runs, when Great Britain will be lesser Britain and greater Britain will be in Australia, Canada, South Africa, and New Zealand. As I stated a moment ago, it would not have been out of place at all if Jan Smuts or if the Premier of Canada had been the British representative upon this council; but the very league itself provides that "the following nations shall have one permanent place each"—nations, empires, monarchies, republics, whatever may be the form of the nation—and it names the United States as one, France as one, Italy as one, Japan as one, and the British Empire as one. So there is nothing in any argument that can be made for the contention that Great Britain and Canada and Australia could have three representatives, or that Great Britain and Canada might each have one representative upon the council, for the provision of the league itself is that the British Empire shall only have one vote upon the council.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I simply desire at this point to interject and call the Senator's attention to the fact that neither Canada nor Australia nor any of the British colonies could ever have a member on the council without the agreement of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You are perfectly correct, and I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to interject that that is a mistake.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The mistake is the mistake of the Senator from Idaho. The vote of the assembly of the league to add a new member to the council is required to be unanimous, and in order to be unanimous the United States must vote affirmatively in favor of the appointment, or designation, whichever you may call it.

As suggested—and I was coming to that in a moment—in order to put anyone upon the council except those who are put there by the very language of the league itself—and those who are put there by that language as permanent members are one representative of the United States, one from Italy, one from France, one from Japan, and one from Great Britain—there must be a vote of the assembly and of the council, and the vote of both on this question must be unanimous. So if anybody attempted to put a Canadian in addition to a native of the British Isles upon the council, even if it were permissible under the league—and it is not—it would require the vote of the United States representative, the vote of the French representative, the vote of the Italian representative, and the vote of the Japanese representative on the council itself in order to permit the thing to be done. National jealousies can be trusted to defeat such a result.

Now, what is the use of talking as Senators have done, if six voices amounts to one vote and one voice amounts to one vote, what is the difference, except right of consultation and debate? It is like an old-fashioned Democratic convention in Mississippi, to which from one county 12 men might be sent, while from another county, perhaps, only 1 might be sent, but each county would have a certain vote, in accordance with the manner in which the convention was called, regardless of the number of delegates representing the county, though every individual might talk and consult and "reason together in brotherly love."

Mr. President, I was about to say here is Cuba, here is Guatemala, here is Honduras, I believe, and Peru, I believe, all represented in the assembly, but none of them upon the council. Here are Canada, Australia, and South Africa, which are represented upon the assembly but none of them upon the council, although a citizen of either might be upon the council as the selected representative of the entire British confederacy. Cuba is, to a certain extent, under the protectorate of the United States; the Central American countries all are partially so, and they are subject to a large extent to our political influence, and to some extent to our control, much more so than free and self-governing Canada would be subject to the control of Great Britain upon any very great question affecting America.

Take, for example, the question which peculiarly concerns California, any question of Japanese immigration or of Hindu immigration. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] knows as well as I do that Canada would take the American view of that question; that Australia would take it; and that the white people in South Africa would take it. He knows that they have already taken strong positions against the orientalization of their respective countries stronger even than we have taken.

We have taken a position emphatic, distinct, and strong.

California has taken it especially and more especially against Chinese immigration. Whence this new-born California Republican Chinese love and devotion?

Canada has gone, if anything, farther than we have, and Australia has gone farther than either in opposition to oriental immigration.

Why are you afraid of men who speak the same language, who have the same literature and the same law, who have inherited the same free institutions from the same source, who have achieved civilization according to the same ethical rules, who have the same concepts of municipal and of international law, who have the same love of peace and the same hatred of war, who have the same love of liberty and the same dread of autocracy and despotism? I do not regard Canadian representation in the assembly as any more an added force to Great Britain than I regard it as an added force to these United States; nor deep down in his heart does the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from California. They know as well as I do that these people have long since passed the stage of mere subject colonies. They are members of the great association of free self-governing Anglo-Saxon Commonwealths. I am no more afraid of the enmity or the treachery or the hatred of Canada than I am of the enmity or the hatred or the treachery of Minnesota or California; but, if I were, why should not these people be allowed a voice or, at any rate, be allowed an opportunity for mutual consultation in the league? While they can not belong to the council, except by Great Britain herself giving place to them or, rather, as the choice of all Great Britain, I do not doubt that the day will come at some time when some great Canadian will be a member of the council, freely selected by all parts of the great British confederacy of free-governing Commonwealths, for that is what it is to-day. The word "Empire" is a misnomer, so far as Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand are concerned. They make their own tariffs; they make their own immigration laws; they declare war when they go to war; and they make peace when peace comes. Great Britain does not even pretend to bind them in any of those respects.

But it seems to me that any American citizen, not only the "common people" to whom the Senator from California has so lovingly referred and concerning whom he rather throws out the intimation that I, perhaps, can not understand them—I do not know why; I am not peculiarly uncommon myself—but I do not understand not only why the common people can not read and understand the President's answer to all this slush, but why the very "commonest" man, even if upon the verge of idiocy, can not do so if he wants to, unless he is blinded by passion, unless back of him somewhere is some influence—hyphenated or otherwise—which biases his intellect. The President has made a great many perfectly clear statements upon his trip that will never be answered by the Senator from California, nor by any 10 men his equals in intellect, in perspicacity, or in reasoning power; but he has stated nothing more clearly than the statement which he made concerning this very question, and that statement, in my opinion, has not only been borne in upon the common people but has been borne in—however unwillingly—upon the uncommon lovers of the common people upon the floor of the Senate. I am of the private opinion that one reason why the Senator's amendment has gone to the tail of the docket is that, whether he recognizes it or not, somebody did recognize the fact that it is doomed to defeat in this body whenever it is voted upon.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If "somebody" thought that, they would have had it up here and had it voted on just as quickly as they could.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unfortunately, we can not take things up.

Mr. BORAH. The greatest possible achievement that those who are opposed to it could possibly accomplish would be to bring it up quickly and defeat it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would be the greatest achievement for whom?

Mr. BORAH. For you and your colleagues.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator must be talking to somebody not on the floor of this body; he must be talking to somebody above the floor. The Senator knows as well as I do that we are perfectly powerless to bring any question to a vote in this body so long as the dominant party does not want it brought to a vote.

Mr. BORAH. Are the Senator and the minority ready to vote solidly now to bring up this amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether the others are or not; I have not held any caucus on the subject. I am.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest that the Senator find out and let us know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the Senator finds out whether or not his side is ready. This, however, is mere childish badinage and return of badinage. The Senator from Idaho knows as well as I do that we can not dictate what shall be done; his side dictates what question shall come up; in fact, the Senate is such an archaic body that even the majority can not dictate when there shall be an end to talk and a vote shall be taken.

Mr. BORAH. We have found that out within the last 24 hours.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How and when? We are ready to vote on the treaty itself. Yes; and we found it out when we were in the majority. Several times we found out that one man could stay away four or five months and come back and talk for four or five hours, if he wanted to, and that this body could do nothing. There exists not upon the face of the globe so august a body so augustly impotent as this.

A majority of nine-tenths can not do anything if the other one-tenth do not want to do it right there and then. A majority of ninety-five ninety-sixths can not do anything unless they physically tire the other one ninety-sixth to death. But the Senator, of course, knew that he was not speaking to the floor when he made that interruption. He was speaking to the conglomerate ignorance of the outside, which does not appreciate the augustness and the impotency of this body. [Laughter.] A conglomerate ignorance strongly backed by the hyphenates in the space above the floor.

Mr. President, I said just a moment ago that the President of the United States had explained this thing. A Senator rose here the other day and said that the President of the United States was guilty either of "misrepresentation" or of something else in his statement of the Shantung proposition, I believe it was.

Mr. President, it will be a long time before any Member of this body will find a majority or even a strong minority of the American people agreeing with him in any insinuation or intimation that the President of the United States is guilty of misrepresentation. He may not be infallible, and, of course, he knows he is not, and we know he is not; but he is about as nearly infallible as the average Senator. The people of the United States may not be willing to agree that he is always right, but they are very much more willing to agree that he is nearly always right than they are to agree that the average Senator is; and it grows out of two reasons: First, because they have confidence in his character and intellectual integrity; secondly, because they have confidence in the fact—and it is a fact—that he has had a better opportunity to acquire the necessary information than the average Senator here.

You can not break down Woodrow Wilson in that way. When you accuse him of lack of intellectual integrity, your accusation is self-accusing. It is a boomerang that goes out and comes back to yourself. Nobody believes it. Nobody will believe it. Whatever some of you, blinded by partisan zeal, or perhaps influenced by outside hyphenated so-called Americanism, may think, the President of the United States stands high in the estimation of the American people because of his honesty of soul and of intellect, because of his high idealism, because of his lofty thought, because of his capacity for clear expression, because of his patriotism, and above all because of his Americanism—not Pinafore Americanism, not comic-opera Americanism, everlastingly exploiting itself and calling attention to itself, but the genuine article that makes a man want to serve America.

By the way, Mr. President, I have hardly ever known a man who would get up and tell somebody here "I am an honest man" that was above suspicion. When a man goes to prating too much about his Americanism, I always begin to look around to see why he wants to defend himself upon the score of possessing a quality that every good American citizen is supposed to possess. The only organized opposition to the league of nations and to the treaty is to be found upon this floor and in certain hyphenated societies in the United States of men who are considering more their love of the country in Europe whence they were derived than the interests and welfare of the world or of the United States, and some others who, worse still, are considering more their hatred of some country in Europe than they are entertaining love for this land, or love for the peace of the world. It is perfectly curious how often, when you trace it back, you will find the consanguinity or the affinity of hyphenation in it.

Mr. President, I pity the man who spends three or four months out in the country crusading against the cause of world peace, even if this instrument be not a perfect instrument to bring it around, and then comes back to this body and makes a speech of as many hours as he spent of weeks in the country—three or four hours—trying to get into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD further emphasis of his opposition to what? To an attempt to bring about the peace of the world and to perpetuate it as fully as poor, fallible human nature, through any instrumentality whatsoever, can bring it about or perpetuate it.

Why, Senators have gone so far, some of them, as to say that this is a document to perpetuate war and to bring about war! Do you, or do any of you, believe anybody is sincere when he makes that statement, unless he is so prejudiced and biased for some reason or other that his intellect ceases to reason clearly? That it may not altogether do away with war and may not everlastingly perpetuate peace is not only very possible but very probable, because now and then human passion leaps all the barriers that human reason has erected to check it; but that its tendency is in that direction, that it will bring to bear toward that end the influence of the great self-governing countries of the world that have achieved liberty, that that is its purpose and intent, though it may more or less fail of accomplishing it, no man can sincerely deny; and that the President of the United States has spent intellect, and I started to say spirit; has expended industry and energy and patience with this view, almost single minded, no man can sincerely pretend to deny.

Oh, "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country." It has ever been the history of the world that in his own country he is apt to be somewhat without honor, sometimes overwhelmingly without it, sufficiently so to be crucified. But, at any rate, you can not tear down this man. He is too big a man, too great a man, he is too much of an idealist—just the very thing that you curse him for being; the best thing in the world that a man can be; a thing bringing him nearer the angels than any other human characteristic can bring him. Sordid politics can not hurt him; hyphenated Americanism can not hurt him; overhasty, undigested expressions even from good men, can not hurt him; and whether the league of nations is adopted this year or 4 years from now or 5 years or 10 years by these United States; whether this Government becomes a member of the league of nations this year or 5 years hence or 10 years hence—and time is of small import in comparison with the great question itself, although it is of immense import now for the present industrial and military peace of the world—whatever may be the lapse of time, the time will come when there will be a league of nations and when we will be members of it, substantially, if not identically, according to the very provisions of this treaty.

Three nations are enough to put it into operation. If you neglect the opportunity of being a charter member then your successors in the Senate will apply for membership later on. We may not get into it much earlier than Germany does if your schemes prevail, but we will get there sooner or later. You can not force the President of the United States to carry on negotiations for an emasculated and impotent instrument, which is about what you choose to make of this league of nations if you can have your way. There are shelves in the White House, and the American people still live, and your successors are not necessarily yourselves. If you want to beat this treaty and beat this league of nations, come out in the open, like men. Ah, you [to Mr. BORAH] have come out; the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has come out; the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in his last utterance came out, although not in his first one. Do it like men, open and above board. Just say you will not have it, you do not believe in it. You think that the American people are able to carry their load in the world alone, isolated from the balance of the world; you want no help, and you ask none——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You say, in the words of the German junkers, and professors, and kaisers, that "the state is sufficient unto itself." Then you must build up a great big army and a great big navy, and have a peace of the world by conquest or domination, as you choose, which you may call the pax Americana. You have to have peace somehow, either by the friendly cooperation of the nations of the world, or by your own domination—you——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish Senators who want to interrupt me would wait until the end of a sentence. You have to have peace somehow in this world, Mr. President. Imperial Rome brought it to the world. Many sins went with her, but that was one virtue.

The Germans had the idea that they would bring about a pax Teutonica, and make it universal through the world, because they, as they asserted, were "the chosen people of God," possessed of the best culture of the world—"kultur," as they call it, which is not quite culture as we understand that term. Some Americans seem to have the idea that that is our mission. But I do not share that belief; but I have no hesitancy in the world in saying that unless you ratify this treaty and enter into this league, making up your mind to amend it after it is ratified, and not before, taking the very advice which George Washington gave regarding the Constitution of the United States, almost in the words I have just repeated—unless you are going to do that, then you must prepare to have the strongest Navy in the world, you must resort to universal military service and have the strongest Army, or at any rate stronger than any other two nations. Condemn your boys and your neighbors' boys to that fate if you will. I shall not voluntarily condemn mine.

Choose ye this day which pathway ye shall pursue. Shall it be one of brotherhood, of cooperation, of fraternal achievement, of peace? Or shall it be one of standing armed cap-a-pie in order to defend your peace against the world if necessary? This league is going to be formed, with you in it or with you out of it. If it is formed with you out of it, you may get into after all by asking to be allowed to get in. As for me, I think it better to go into now as a charter member.

When we accepted the Constitution of the United States, some of the greatest patriots in America—Samuel Adams, Patrick Henry, and George Mason, amongst others—said, "Here is this error, here is that one; here is this defect, here is that one; here is this omission, and there is that commission. We do not want it unless it is amended beforehand."

But Thomas Jefferson from Paris wrote, and George Washington here in America advised, and Alexander Hamilton here in America advised, and John Adams here in America advised, that we should take it first and amend it afterwards. We followed that advice. Had we not we and South America would have presented to-day the same picture to the world.

Now, I am going to say something that may cause some Senators, perhaps, to differ from me; that is that it will be easier to amend this league of nations after it shall have been adopted than it is to amend the Constitution of the United States. The advice of Jefferson, of Washington, of John Adams, and of Hamilton was taken, and within two years the first 10 amendments to the Constitution were adopted, which cured its glaring defects. Its most glaring defect was that while it took care of the States in the Federal Government, it did not take care of the rights of the individual citizen as against those of the Government. So the 10 amendments, the Bill of Rights, were put into it, which accomplished that great purpose, which was a purpose entertained in the very soul of Mr. Jefferson.

Why not pursue that policy with regard to this world constitution? Adopt it with its defects, since it is heading in the right direction, and then proceed to amend it. Do you imagine there is any reasonable amendment to the league of nations which the great American Republic could suggest that would not be accepted in Europe? Or do you belong to that class of people who seem to think that the whole world is in a conspiracy against America? The world has but one conspiracy on hand, so far as America is concerned, Mr. President, and that is a conspiracy to be in accord with her if possible. The nations of Europe are running over one another in emulation, each to prove itself her best friend. There is no conspiracy against America, because it is neither to the interest nor within the will of any people anywhere that there should be.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will develop his argument that the league will be more easily amended if we agree to accept the treaty now than if we insist on amendments in advance?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, two countries have insisted on amendment in advance thus far. Both were advised they could either come in or stay out. I do not know whether the great United States would be treated in that way or not. I rather imagine not. But that was the answer that China got, that was the answer that Roumania got, and that might be the answer that we would receive.

Furthermore, Mr. President, if you make any amendment to this treaty that will carry it back to the Paris conference you will summon up all the spirits from the Plutonian depths. The Polish question, the Czechoslovakian question, the Dalmatian coast question, including the mooted point of Fiume, the open wedge toward the Balkans for a seacoast port for Poland—every question will come up de novo. The Japanese will have something to say, the Italians will have a great deal to say. You would send it back there simply to be thrown into a caldron to boil, so that you could skim from the top, as best you could, the nonessential things that might arise. You have no right to suppose that you can just simply amend this to suit yourselves while the balance of the nations of the world would not offer amendments for themselves.

Moreover, you would have to carry it back to Germany in order to bind Germany. Ah, a great many of you think Germany is helpless. She is not. Three hundred thousand men to-day, under one pretense or another, as police or voluntary soldiers, are under arms in Germany, mobilized and ready for action. She can remobilize her whole army in 48 to 72 hours, if they are willing to come; and I have no reason to suppose that they are not if they see any hope of victory. Read what Mr. Morgenthau says about it in the article I had inserted in the RECORD this morning.

Now, Mr. President, so much for the difficulty of amending in advance. How shall you amend it if we ratify it first? Nine men around the board can do it. If the two great countries of Great Britain and the United States unite in pressing an amendment, unless it goes to the very vital interest or the essential integrity and liberty and life of some other country it will be accepted in the sense proposed by one or both of them.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is not that as true to-day as it would be after the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not—emphatically not.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is it not true that after the ratification of the treaty we will be threatened with troubles from the Plutonian depths no less than we would be now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; because after the ratification of the treaty the council would consider amendments, and now all the representatives of all the civilized world that appear at the peace conference must be consulted, including Germany.

After ratification the provision for the amendment of the instrument, which it carries within its own lines, will come into operation, and there is no great difficulty about it, except the difficulty that many people imagine to lie in unanimous consent.

But there are these nine people around a table, all wise statesmen, who could agree around the council board at once that section so-and-so means this and section so-and-so means that, without throwing it all back to be reconsidered by everybody and reboiled in an international caldron. They will be superior men, accustomed to compromise in the interest of harmony.

France, I hope, will ratify the treaty in a few days. Three powers will soon be signatories to it. We have been the leaders in this great movement, and we are leading the world in idealism now, and I hope the time will never come, Mr. President, when we will not lead the world in idealism. What does that mean? It means that we are unselfishly looking toward an ideal. We have led the world thus far along that line. Practical politicians may cynically curse idealism. It has not thus far prevailed in Democratic or Republican conventions or primaries. That is about the extent of their vision. They may think, therefore, that it is worth nothing. But Napoleon Bonaparte was right when he said that imagination is the motive force of the world. Idealism, in the long run, wins, because behind it is "the divinity that shapes our ends, roughhew them as we may." In the long run God's purpose is accomplished, and that is always idealism; and the thing which prophets have foretold and which poets have sung and which Christ, the Prince of Peace, preached, will come some time or other, whether practical politicians in their miserable littleness and vanity cynically grin at it or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in just a moment. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] upon the request of the Senator from California, has placed in the record a letter purporting to give the opinion of Clemenceau and Lloyd-George to the effect that Canada, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand are eligible under the covenant of the league of nations for membership upon the council. The letter was introduced for the purpose of supporting the argument of the Senator from California that Great Britain, by reason of its six votes in the assembly, would have a great advantage in electing members of the council and might succeed in electing to the council Canada or Australia, or even four of such self-governing colonies. I then interjected in the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who was then speaking, a statement that none of these self-governing colonies could be selected as members of the council without the consent of the United States. I was under the impression that I heard expressions of dissent to this proposition. It is for such reason that I desire to place into the RECORD at this time the exact articles of the covenant of the league of nations determinative of the question. Article 4 provides——

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not hear the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to submit an interrogatory to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Possibly the Senator had better wait until I read this, so as to have it before the Senate, and then I will be very pleased to listen to his interrogatory.

I am reading from article 4 of the covenant.

The council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly, representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece shall be members of the council.

That is the way the council is constituted. At the present time the membership of the council is complete. It consists of the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece. It is within the power of the assembly to substitute other representatives for Brazil, Belgium, Spain, and Greece, but until so substituted by consent of all of the members of the assembly those countries remain as the four other countries having representation on the council. How may the change be made? As above quoted article 4 of the covenant provides that "these four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion." They are to be selected by the assembly. Not by a majority of the assembly but by a unanimous decision of the assembly.

I read from article 5 of the covenant:

Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of the present treaty, decisions at any meeting of the assembly or of the council shall require the agreement of all of the members of the league represented at the meeting.

I call attention to the fact that no changes can be made in the council as now constituted, nor can any of the British colonies be placed thereon unless all of the members agree thereto. We will have a member of the assembly if we join the league; we will always have a member of the assembly, and while there may be a dispute as to whether Canada and Australia and the other self-governing British colonies are qualified under the covenant to become members of the council, there is no question at all that under the covenant they can never become members of the council without the unanimous consent of the assemblage, which must always include our representative. That is the situation.

Now I will answer the question of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I will not interrupt the Senator now, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is anxious to get away to catch a train. I will submit some observations after he gets through.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will read one other article from the covenant to disclose the fact that there can be no change in the council, and that the assembly practically has no power, without the unanimous concurrence of the council. I read from the latter section of article 15, page 31:

In any case referred to the assembly, all the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

In other words, under that article of the covenant the power of the assembly is nothing more than an obstructive power, because it can accomplish nothing without the unanimous concurrence of the council or the unanimous concurrence of those Governments represented on the council. In other words, you can refer a matter to the assembly if you want to, and a majority of the assembly may arrive at a decision, but that decision amounts to nothing until it is concurred in by all of the representatives on the council.

It is also true, under article 4, that the number of members of the council may be increased, but this increase can only be made upon a unanimous vote of the council and with the approval of a majority of the members of the assembly. I say with a unanimous vote of the council because, under article 5, which I have already quoted, all decisions of the council or the assembly must be unanimous unless in the covenant otherwise expressly provided. It is not expressly provided in this case, and therefore the membership of the council can not be increased without the agreement of all of the members of the council. We, if we join the league, are permanent members of the council and our consent would be necessary to increase the membership of the council. The language of article 4, dealing with the increase of the council, is as follows:

With the approval of the majority of the assembly the council may name additional members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council; the council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I regret that time does not permit an extended answer to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but there are one or two errors he has fallen into, and those errors I desire to correct.

Mr. THOMAS. May I interrupt the Senator by asking him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to ascertain whether I properly understood what the Senator said when he had the floor a few moments ago. I understood him to say that his amendment had by agreement been postponed for final consideration to the end of the consideration of the league. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Probably the Senator did.

Mr. THOMAS. Is there an agreement to that effect?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not know whether you would call it an agreement or not. I talked to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], representing the other side, respecting the matter, and I talked to certain Senators on this side of the Chamber who represent a view that is at variance with my own, and I learned from those with whom I talked that it would be an impossibility at the present time, or within the next 28 or 48 hours, to bring up that particular amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to clarify the situation. It is the first intimation I have had of any agreement or understanding whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Perhaps I should not dignify it by the statement that it was an agreement. It was an inquiry on my part. The statement which I make I think was not questioned by any of those who were interested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a fact, anyhow, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON af California. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says it is a fact that it could not be brought up.

Mr. THOMAS. It is undoubtedly true that it could not be brought up now; but I was curious to know who had made the agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber, but some one has informed me that my name was mentioned as entering into an agreement. The Senator from California spoke to me, and I told him as far as I was personally concerned I would prefer that the amendment be voted on last.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. But I had no authority to speak for the Democratic side, and I suggested that the Senator see the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. That is my recollection of the conversation. There was not any agreement, so far as I know, other than that he should see the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to say that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] did not see me on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is quite true. The Senator from California never stated that he saw the Senator from Nebraska upon that or any other subject that I am aware of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For information I should like to renew the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado. With whom was the agreement made?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have explained exactly what transpired. I am unable to furnish the Senator with any other facts.

Mr. President, permit me just a moment with respect to this matter. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entirely in error when he says that Canada is not eligible upon the council of the league of nations, with Great Britain a member there as well. Under the statement that has been made by the President of the United States, the Premier of France, and the Premier of Great Britain, Canada may become and is eligible to become a member of the council of the league of nations, and the British Empire, if Canada did become a member, would have two votes upon the council. I am speaking now of eligibility and not of what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] referred to at all—the mode of selection. As to eligibility, all the self-governing colonies of Great Britain will be eligible to become members of the council.

In his statement of the facts the Senator from Mississippi, I think, erred. What seems to me to have been overlooked in discussing the votes of Great Britain is the fact that India is added, which is not a self-governing colony at all. India was added as a sixth vote only, but with none of the characteristics and with none of the qualities possessed by Canada, by South Africa, by New Zealand, or by Australia.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will yield for a question. I am in a hurry to leave. If it is for an argument, no; if it is for a question, yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to ask the Senator this question: As I understand the Senator's amendment, it does not propose to take away from India or any of the colonies of the British Empire the right of a vote in the assembly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator from New Mexico is correct in that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If that is the purpose of the amendment, should we not confine our argument to the point which involves the right of the United States? While the Senator is here and there is a large number of Senators present, I really believe he would perform a great public service if the Senator would point out specifically where the United States would be benefited by having six or a dozen votes instead of the one vote which it has. Those of us who have given some consideration to this question contend that in only two cases would it make a particle of difference whether the United States had 1 vote or 50 votes, and that is in the admission of members to the league and mere matters of procedure before the assembly, the matters of procedure being questions of adjournment and things of that kind. Except those two things——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Has not the Senator stated his position and is not that ample? May I not proceed, because I am somewhat in a hurry?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator very kindly, for the purpose of giving us information, because this is his amendment and he is expecting to leave the city and we will not have opportunity to interrogate him while he is gone——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator will have ample opportunity.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask him now to point out wherein the United States would be benefited by having more than one vote other than in those two particulars.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator has asked that question six times, and I think that is ample for the particular purpose of the query. The Senator from New Mexico will have opportunity to interrogate the Senator from California upon this amendment when ultimately it is voted upon, as well as upon the present occasion, because I expect to be here when the amendment ultimately comes up. Referring now to the particular matters to which the Senator from New Mexico adverts and to which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] referred, it is not a question, as the Senator from Mississippi says, that these self-governing colonies should be allowed a voice in the league. He makes the same plea that the President made, that they are allied to us by racial characteristics, that they are allied to us by sacrifices in the war and the like. Admit it all; concede everything that may be said in praise of Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and the other colonies of Britain; but that is not the point. We do allow them a voice by permitting them to be members of the league exactly as originally was planned and exactly as stated in the covenant of the league of nations. What we propose to do is to give our country the same proportionate vote that is given to Great Britain and to her colonies by the league covenant.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] asks again and again why that should be done. It should be done because the one great powerful nation of the earth is our Nation; the one great predominating figure of the league of nations, if we enter it, will be the United States of America; the one great asset for peace that there is in all the world is our Republic; and because we are the dominating Nation of the world, because we are the richest and the most powerful, the least spent of all the nations of the earth, because we are the greatest asset for peace that there is in the world, our Nation should be allowed a proportionate vote, an equal vote, with any other nation on earth.

There was not any reason in the world advanced by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and none has been advanced by the President, for giving India a vote in the league. Absolutely there can be no justification upon the theory of a self-governing colony for saying that India shall have a sixth vote after Britain has been allowed five votes. You say to me that there is a veto power, as the President has repeated throughout the country, in the United States upon the council and sometimes in the assembly. Granted; but a veto power is not always potent by any means. When you set six men down upon one side and one man down upon the other side, the six, by the very disproportion of numbers, may prevail. Every man who has practiced law has had exactly that sort of experience; every man who has sat in any deliberative body of any sort knows that that is the fact. To give one nation six votes in the assembly and to give to another nation one vote, gives to the nation with the six votes a preponderating power which ought not to be tolerated by our Nation at least, for we are the preponderating Nation of the earth.

The Senator from Mississippi simply says, in reecho of the President's argument, that six equal one and one equals six. It is a metaphysical tragedy, a mathematical cataclysm on the part of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that. I said the six voices counted as one vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, six voices might equal one voice; I grant that may sometimes be true, even of the voice of the Senator from Mississippi or of mine in a particular instance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said the six voices equaled one vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The six voices are equal to one vote; but the six voices do vote upon matters that are of grave consequence in this league. They not only vote on the selection of members of the council but they have jurisdiction of anything that affects the peace of the world. The covenant so states and the particular provisions in that regard have been presented to the Senate in the past. They will be read, I hope, by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] as well in presenting this matter. Recently when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] addressed the Senate he pointed, and pointed with accuracy, to the various provisions in the covenant showing that the assembly has not only the power that has been attributed to it by the Senator from Mississippi and by the Senator from New Mexico, but that it has a tremendous jurisdiction in dealing with almost every international matter that might be taken cognizance of by the council.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield for a question but not for an argument, however eloquent it may be.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator if in all of those matters to which he has just now referred the vote in the assembly must not be unanimous, and therefore have the affirmative vote of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not always, sir. I dislike, Mr. President, to indulge in details, but take an instance where the United States and the Empire of Japan may have a difference; assume that from the council into the assembly comes a dispute or controversy between Japan and the United States. When it is taken into the assembly thus each party to the controversy must stand aside, for neither of them can vote under the covenant of the league of nations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, just at that point I should like to ask the Senator in such a case would the United States have any vote even though it were granted a dozen votes in the assembly?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is not the point; and that shows the peculiar sort of mental strabismus that affects us today, in considering the question of 6 votes for Great Britain and 1 for the United States. Of course, we could not vote then; we would have to stand aside; but we are confronted with the fact that another nation sits there with an offensive and defensive alliance with Japan that casts 6 votes in that particular matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I refuse to yield at present. The Senator will have to pardon me, because I am very limited as to time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I mean no discourtesy to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON of California But he will have to pardon me, for my time is very limited. I should be delighted to remain here and discuss this question. I am coming back to discuss it again, and I promise the Senator from New Mexico that I will then stand here for a day if he desires me to answer any questions he may ask in respect to the matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wanted to ask the Senator——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. KNOX. Is the Senator from California entitled to the floor when he declines to yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He certainly is; and he is not subject to be interrupted if he does not desire to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I repeat, so that there may be no misunderstanding concerning it, that when a controversy between the United States and another nation comes into the assembly both must stand aside, and then the United States is confronted with six votes being cast by Great Britain upon a matter, perhaps, of grave importance. If Senators will examine the labor provisions in the treaty, they will find a disproportion as well with respect to the representation in the labor council. Passing that, however, the fact is that six votes are given to the Empire of Great Britain. Why persist in saying that we are like unto them; that we ought to have an Anglo-Saxon alliance; that, after all, it is the English-speaking people who shall go forward in progress and shall go forward for peace, who shall make the world what it ought to be, who, indeed represent idealism and altruism, and who, after all, are the people who ultimately are going to rule the world? That is not the point at all. Even though in the future you expect the alliance suggested, even though in the days to come the Anglo-Saxon peoples may come together as never they have come before, upon what theory, nevertheless, will you to-day enter into a situation, put yourselves in a position where you will have one-sixth of the votes of any nation on the face of the earth? There is not any justification for it in logic; there can not be any in your love of country; there is not any justification for it in anything that has been said by the President or by the Senator from Mississippi.

The Senator from Mississippi to-day amplified the arguments of the President. The President has simply said it is a matter of little consequence and that the veto power exists. Therefore, he is philosophical about the particular proposition. I am not philosophical about it at all. I have that peculiar jealousy of our representation in the council and in the assembly that, had I all possible friendliness for another nation, I could not tolerate that our Nation should have one-sixth of the representation of any other nation on earth. If there were not a peculiar psychology which has come to us out of the war, a singular mental distortion that causes us not to look things accurately in the face, we would not for an instant to-day permit such a proposition to be suggested to us, much less would we be found in advocacy of it.

Look back three years when our intellects were normal; look forward three years when again we will be a normal people and when the psychology of war will have passed from us. Imagine three years ago any man coming to us and saying that this country should enter into a partnership with any nation on the face of the earth, according to the terms of which that nation should have 6 votes and we should have 1 vote; we would not have listened to it for a second. Three years hence, when we have recovered our equilibrium, when the war is no longer near to us and its anguish no longer touches us, we will resent any such proposition being put upon the American people just as hotly as we would have resented it three years ago.

The Senator from Mississippi, adverting to the opposition to the league of nations, says it is confined to blind partisanship and to hyphenated Americans. That is not so; it is not confined to blind partisanship or to hyphenated Americanism of any sort or of any character.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor did the Senator from Mississippi say that. I said that was the only organized opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am glad that I did not understand the Senator correctly; but the statement has been made inferentially by the President of the United States himself—inferentially, I say—and the effort has been made to frighten the opposition to this un-American pact with this old bogey man with which so many people were frightened during the war, by calling men who oppose it pro-Germans and insinuating that they are something that they ought not to be, by endeavoring to have them cease opposition to that which conscientiously they oppose. Let me say to my friends here that the time has gone by when the American people can be frightened by epithets, denunciation, abuse, and by calling them pro-German or any other name that you may see fit to apply to them. That time passed with the war, thank God. I hope that it never again will come back in this Republic.

Men to-day have the right to express themselves upon this question and to argue it without having epithets of any sort applied to them. When any man says this side of the Chamber is actuated either by blind partisanship or by pro-Germanism he says that which he knows is utterly inaccurate and without foundation in fact. Partisanship! Where lies it? Partisanship is not here; partisanship is with those who would blindly take whatever is presented to them coming from a partisan administration. Partisanship lies not with the men who stand here asking that this country be given equal representation even with Great Britain.

What a terrible thing it is, my friends! You are pro-German if you stand upon the floor of the United States Senate and say your country and my country should have equal representation in this league with Great Britain! Whence came it to be a reproach to stand here for the Republic and for Americanism? When did it become a sin for a man to say that his country, as great and as powerful as the British Empire, was entitled to the same representation as the great British Empire? I will not subscribe to the sort of doctrine that has been scattered over the country lately; I will not subscribe to the idea that a man can not oppose this covenant without having applied to him epithets of every character by all kinds of people. The men who stand here to-day are fighting with a conscientious effort in behalf of what they think is right and in behalf of that which, in their opinion, will not imperil the future destiny of the Nation. They are indulging in no epithets; they are not questioning any man's motives. It is a mighty poor advocate who can only hurl against those who are in opposition to his cause epithets and impute to them all sorts of questionable motives.

Mr. President, in the brief period that is mine I can not do more than to say to you that this amendment provides not that there shall be taken from Canada, from South Africa, from Australia, from New Zealand, or even from India the votes they have in the league; it simply provides that wherever those votes appear, wherever they are cast, wherever they act, the United States of America shall have an equal voting strength and shall act with exactly the same power as that with which Great Britain and her colonies act. Upon what days have we fallen when Americans, Senators of the United States of America, shall question the idea that America shall have an equal voting power with any nation on the face of the earth!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from California goes I want to say this:

He has instanced a case where the United States and Japan would have a dispute, and where both would stand aside, and then he says that the six votes of Great Britain, as he calls them inaccurately, although four of them are the votes of our blood kin—Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa—would be cast against the United States because of an offensive and defensive alliance with Japan.

In the first place, there is no such offensive and defensive alliance. There never has been; the alliance has been purely defensive and confined to the Orient. In the second place, I dare say that if Japan and the United States had a dispute, and both had to stand aside, Canada and Australia and New Zealand at any rate, and probably South Africa, would always vote with the United States against Japan; and I say that every man acquainted with public opinion in those self-governing Commonwealths as to Japan and the Orient knows that to be a fact. Their voices and votes would be a source of strength to us of the United States and not of weakness in the very case which he has instanced.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the inquiry addressed to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] precipitates a rather interesting question concerning some features of the covenant for the league of nations which to my mind have not been attended to very closely by some Senators.

The Senator from Illinois wanted to know from the Senator from Mississippi whether it would not be easier to amend the covenant before the treaty is ratified than after the treaty is ratified.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have not the transcript of my question before me; but I think, to be precise, that I asked the Senator to pursue his argument to prove that amendment would be easier after adoption than before.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I propose to follow that inquiry.

Mr. President, before this treaty is ratified, any amendment of it whatever must have the approval of every signatory to the treaty. Germany is a signatory to the treaty. Any change whatever in it, whether in article 1, comprising the covenant of the league of nations, or any other provision which affects her interests, must have the approval of Germany. But however it be, every change must have the approval of every signatory to the treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. One moment. After the treaty is ratified, article 1, the covenant for the league of nations, may be amended as follows:

ART. 26. Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

In other words, before the treaty is ratified, any amendment must have the concurrence of every signatory to it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. After the treaty is ratified, if it has the concurrence of those States who have representatives upon the council, and a majority of all the members of the assembly, it may be amended.

I yield now to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Montana does not mean to say that Germany's consent must be had to an amendment of the articles of the covenant?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Germany's consent must be had to any amendment of the articles of the covenant.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I read to the Senator the colloquy between the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and the President?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a matter of no consequence to me what the Senator may read. I read from the covenant.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Montana means that he holds the judgment of the President of the United States upon this covenant to be of small account?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not. I respect his judgment about it very much, but the covenant is perfectly plain with respect to the matter. The covenant provides that it may be amended by the concurrence of the council and a majority of the members of the assembly. Germany is not a member of the assembly at all.

Mr. McCORMICK. Nor of the league.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wait a minute—nor is she a member of the council, nor is she a member of the league; so that after the treaty is ratified an amendment of the covenant for the league of nations may be made without consulting or conferring with Germany at all. Now, wait. She is, however, one of the nations signatory to the treaty. The treaty can not be amended in any particular whatever before it goes into effect—at least in any particular in which her interests are involved—without her consent.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] some time ago advanced the idea that, whereas Germany is not a member of the league, any amendment may now be made in the covenant without the consent of Germany; but, Mr. President, that is not sound at all, and the least reflection, I believe, will convince any man of the error of that conclusion. Germany, although she is not a member of the league, is vitally interested in the constitution of the league. Numberless provisions of the treaty place in the league of nations powers of the most vital interest and concern to Germany. She is interested, for instance, in who shall be members of the league, and therefore in the provision by which members may be admitted to the league. She is vitally concerned in what nations shall be represented upon the council, and therefore she is vitally concerned in how the council is constituted.

Why, Mr. President, even though she is not a member of the league, she is subject to its provisions. Let me call your attention to article 17, as follows:

In the event of a dispute between a member of the league and a State which is not a member of the league, or between States not members of the league, the State or States not members of the league shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the council may deem just. If such invitation is accepted, the provisions of articles 12 to 16, inclusive, shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the council.

And then:

If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute and shall resort to war against a member of the league, the provisions of article 16 shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

Accordingly, Mr. President, Germany is vitally concerned in the constitution of this league, because she may at any time be invited to accept membership for the purpose of the determination of any dispute in which she may become involved with any other State, and if she goes to war in disregard of the provisions of the league covenant she becomes liable to all the pains and penalties prescribed by it as against a member who goes to war under those circumstances.

Accordingly, Mr. President, it can not be said that because Germany is not a member of the league she is not vitally interested and concerned in every feature of the covenant by which that league is to be operated and amended. She assumes large responsibilities because of the provisions in the covenant, and accordingly you can not possibly change that covenant after Germany signs this treaty and before it is ratified unless she acquiesces in it and accords her assent, at least, to the amendment proposed; but after the ratification of the treaty you can change the league at will without her concurrence.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator this question: The treaty provides that it shall become effective, so far as Germany is concerned, upon being ratified by three of the principal powers. If the treaty is ratified by England, France, and Japan prior to ratification by the United States, has not Germany then consented to amendments of the covenant of the league of nations without her consent or without requiring their submission to her?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, Mr. President, that is so simple; that is so easy! As a matter of course, if Germany signs a treaty with Great Britain and France and Italy she is bound by it so far as they are concerned. If she does not sign the treaty which we offer to her, she has not signed any treaty with which we have anything to do. We have no part in it whatever; and, consequently, when we come into the league, we can not change this covenant without the assent of Germany. We can not limit our obligations with respect to this matter, even though Germany has signed the treaty. Why, as a matter of course, if all the other nations of the world sign it except us, it probably will go into operation and Germany will assume all of the obligations that there are in it; but that is entirely aside from the question as to what the situation will be if we amend it. In that event we will have no treaty whatever with Germany.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the question that has been discussed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and only a word.

Assuming, for the purpose of my remarks, that the Senator from Montana is entirely correct with reference to the vote, which I at this time do not either debate or controvert, to my mind there is a much more important question than that lying behind this controversy, so far as amendments are concerned. It is not the question, Mr. President, of mere facility of securing an amendment; it is the question, if it is a vital amendment, of making sure that we secure it before we are bound by the league at all. After we have joined the league and after we have ratified the treaty we may or we may not get our amendment. There may be some one who would refuse to vote or consent to the change. Assuming that it is easier to do it after we get in, so far as mere votes are concerned, yet the Senator must concede that there is a possibility, and even a probability, that upon many questions there is the power there to prevent it. So we may say, Mr. President, that the question of amendment is not the matter of the mere facility of securing the amendment, but we should make absolutely certain that we get it before we enter into and become a part of the league.

There is only one way to make certain of that, and that is to present the amendment, and if it is not accepted then we are not members of the league; we are not bound by a league which we do not want to be bound by, and we are going in under a league only which is satisfactory to us and which we know will be satisfactory to us. If we ratify the treaty, we are bound and we may never get our amendment. We are in, and, however onerous, all must stay in unless all consent we may get out.

Let me take an illustration. The Senator from Montana is a lawyer of wide experience. Suppose some client of his should bring a contract to him, a contract which had been drawn by another party and to which another party had attached his signature, which contract was to be passed upon by the Senator as a lawyer; and suppose that in looking over the matter both the Senator and his client should come to the conclusion that there were clauses in that contract which were ambiguous and uncertain, and clauses in the contract which the client might deem dangerous or menacing to his welfare and his interests. Suppose he should say, "Senator WALSH, here are terms in this contract which, to my mind, are dangerous, and the contract involves not only my interest but the interest of my children and my children's children for all time to come. It is a matter of tremendous concern to me."

Would the Senator, as a lawyer, say "You put your signature to that contract and I will take it over to the other man and see if he will consent to what you think is vital to your interests"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, is canvassing a question altogether separate and apart from that which I was discussing.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but I am simply presenting my side of the controversy.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad to answer the Senator, of course. The only certain way to get an amendment in, if we want it, but taking the risk of total failure, is to offer it beforehand.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is not any question in the world about that. Of course, in doing that we take the risk of wrecking the whole proposition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me finish the instance given by the Senator from Idaho. When the draft of the provision was offered to me as a lawyer, I would say: "Now, such an amendment ought to be made, in my judgment. I think perhaps you are running some risk in signing that contract without that amendment in it." But my client might say, "Well, now, I am afraid the other fellow will back out of it if I propose that to him." And then, of course, I would be obliged to say, "Well, of course, you will have to take that chance." Finally he concludes that, after all, perhaps he had better let it go and see if we could not fix it up with him after we get his signature.

Mr. BORAH. But you are taking a chance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course.

Mr. BORAH. That is the exact position in which those who are offering these amendments are placed; they regard the amendments as so vital and of such gravity that if they can not enter the league with the amendments for their protection they would rather remain out. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am debating a matter with which I am very little concerned. I am not deeply moved by these amendments, so far as the final disposition of them is concerned. It is a step in the right direction, but only a step and, to my mind, a very short and halting step in the right direction. I sincerely hope that the statement which the President of the United States is purported to have made this morning, and the statement which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has intimated would be carried out, will be carried out. I sincerely hope that if these amendments are put on, the President will exert his influence to bring the question of a league or no league to a test. To my mind, that is the only real and genuine way to treat this question. I do not think that any amendments have been offered or will be offered that will protect America's interest and America's principles, and therefore I am debating a matter in which I am only very slightly concerned. I am concerned in defeating the whole proposition of a league. I shall state my reason when this preliminary skirmish about reservations is over. I hope then to see the real fight take on its just significance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The so-called Fall amendments were agreed to be taken up to-day.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to discuss the Fall amendments?

Mr. OWEN. If there is any action contemplated on the Fall amendments, Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, the Fall amendments are undoubtedly before the Senate at this time under the arrangement entered into, are they not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed that they should be brought before the Senate to-day; but I have uttered the first word on the subject, I think, that has been uttered to-day.

The Chair was about to make a statement of the Chair's opinion, so that if there is any appeal to be taken from it or any dispute about the idea of the Chair being correct, the appeal can be taken and settled on the day on which it was agreed to proceed with the consideration of the Fall amendments. The Chair thinks that those amendments are now before the Senate, and if undisposed of at the hour of adjournment this evening they will come up automatically from day to day until finally disposed of. If that coincides with the view of the Senate, and there is no appeal, it will be so understood, and we can proceed to discuss everything else besides the Fall amendments.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Chair to say that under the vote taken by the Senate September 23 the Fall amendments will come up from day to day until disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will remain before the Senate as the pending question until disposed of, so far as the treaty with Germany is concerned.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the only instance which the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] gave of the importance of the so-called six votes of the British Empire was in cases dealing with a point or controversies supposed to take place between Japan and the United States. I have the highest admiration for the Senator from California and approve many of the things for which the Senator from California stands, and particularly his attitude toward machine rule and popular government. But in this particular instance I differ with him, and I want to point out that under article 15, if such a controversy should arise, the sum and substance of the action of the assembly would be to put the report that they might make upon the same basis precisely as the report of the council under article 12. The report of the council, under article 12, if it should be unanimous against the United States, would have no further effect than to restrain Japan, if the United States refused to carry out the decision, from making war on the United States for 90 days after the decision. Without the treaty, Japan could make war on us without notice. If we concurred in the decision, Japan could not make war on us at all except as an outlaw.

It is the expressed opinion of mankind, operating through the publicity of the assembly which is of importance, and when it comes to the question of these six votes it ought to be remembered that the opinion of mankind will be shown at the council table by those who are represented, and not by the number of votes. When the voice of the United States is heard in the assembly it will be a very different voice than that which would be heard coming from the smallest and weakest of all the Republics of the earth. The assembly will be, I take it, a round table, but, after all, there is some force in the old saying that "where MacGregor sits is the head of the table."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, possibly I misunderstood the statement which the Senator made a moment ago as to the effect of the decision of the council under article 15. I understood him to say that the only effect of the unanimous decision of the council, so far as the United States is concerned, would be to defer the making of war. Was I correct in that understanding?

Mr. OWEN. I will read from article 15:

> In any case referred to the assembly, all of the provisions of this article and of article 12 relating to the action and powers of the council shall apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided that a report made by the assembly, if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have THE SAME FORCE as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

Mr. FALL. Certainly, that is true.

Mr. OWEN. Under article 12, to which I am referring, members of the league—

> Agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.
> In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

So that a decision of the assembly, not by a majority only, but if it were unanimous, could only have the effect of a report in council, and the effect of a report in council would be to forbid the parties litigant from going to war for three months.

Mr. FALL. That is not the only effect of it. That is exactly the question I was asking, whether the Senator made that point or not.

Mr. OWEN. I will be pleased to have the Senator point out any error.

Mr. FALL. The consequences are so much more serious than those indicated by the Senator, that I simply asked if I correctly understood him in his statement of the consequences. I do not agree at all; but I do not care to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I should be pleased to have the Senator point out directly any error.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, under article 15 the decision of the assembly, made in the words which the Senator has read, has the same effect, not as a majority decision of the council, but as a unanimous decision of the council. The Senator has said that the only effect of that is to prevent the United States from going to war for nine months.

Mr. OWEN. Three months, I said.

Mr. FALL. The article says that the council can take six months to decide a question, and that the nation interested will not go to war for three months after the decision. The Senator said nine months.

Mr. OWEN. I said three months after the decision.

Mr. FALL. The decision may be made the next day, so that you would be restrained from going to war for three months and one day.

But that is not the penalty, Mr. President. The penalty is that if you do not obey the decision of the assembly, arrived at as prescribed in article 15, you become an international outlaw, the whole world is against you, the whole world might bring economic and financial pressure against you, and pledge the armies of the world against you.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no; not unless you go into an aggressive war. You have to go into Mexico first.

Mr. FALL. That is a question I do not care to go into with the Senator. I shall make the argument in my own time.

Mr. OWEN. Not unless you go into a war.

Mr. FALL. I would have to go into the question as to what was war and what was an act of war.

Mr. OWEN. There is another feature of this matter to which apparently no attention has been given.

While Canada has a vote, and Canada might be expected to vote the same way that India would, we know perfectly well that India would like to admit the Hindus to Canada and that Canada would not like to admit the Hindus to Canada. They differ about the question of immigration. Canada, Australia, and New Zealand are opposed to immigration of the Japanese, and so are we. They have that community of interest in that one great important question that we might see arising in the future.

But that is not all. As far as Canada voting perhaps with Great Britain on some question, we have 16 different western American Republics who would vote the same way we would on matters touching American interests. We have immediately adjacent to us Cuba, that is to——

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. What possible guaranty is there that any one of the 16 may vote with us?

Mr. OWEN. Common interest.

Mr. NEW. No ties of any other character than mere common interest?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; common sense.

Mr. NEW. Perhaps in that case they would all vote with us.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator interrupted me; I was about to point out that there is Cuba at our door, whose representative would undoubtedly vote with the United States in any matter affecting the interest of the United States. There is Haiti, there is San Salvador, there is Honduras, there is Nicaragua, there is Panama, all of them very close immediate neighbors having such interest in the welfare of the United States that they would be just as certain to vote with the United States as the dominions of Great Britain might be fancied would vote with Great Britain on some particular matters. But I remind Senators that it is going far to say that Panama, with a hundred thousand people, should have a vote, and that India, with 300,000,000 people, should not have a vote. I think we are straining this proposal. India, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada are great self-governing dominions. Australia is almost as big as the United States in size. I am not quite sure at the moment of the area, but it is a perfectly enormous country, whose future destinies will justify representation, undoubtedly. Canada is our close neighbor, with 3,000 miles of undefended frontier, and the idea of Canada voting against the interests of the United States is entirely unthinkable. But it is not a question of whether she does or does not. Here are all these small Republics right at our doors whose interests are indissolubly intertwined with our own, and who would undoubtedly offset any of these supposed adverse votes of the great self-governing countries who are admitted into this league as individual members.

Great Britain might object to all of these little nations voting, but does not for the reason that whether they vote or not is of no serious importance.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Is the Senator sure that Haiti would vote with us?

Mr. OWEN. I think so.

Mr. FALL. I would not indulge in the same assurance with reference to other nations which the Senator has mentioned, but in view of the fact that the marines of the United States are now governing Haiti, I rather imagine possibly they might vote with us.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator for agreeing with me at least on that one proposition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in referring to article 26 made a statement which attracted my attention. I want to ask him if he will look at that article again and then answer the question which I wish to submit to him. The article reads as follows:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

Something the Senator said, which I can not now quote accurately because I have not the reporter's notes before me, led me to think that he construed that as meaning that an amendment proposed must have the unanimous vote of the representatives of the league in the council and then a majority of the members of the league in the assembly. I wanted to make sure whether I understood him correctly or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My understanding is that the members of the assembly from the nine States represented in the council sit in the council as well. They would be the same——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; that is not my understanding, if I may say to the Senator. My understanding is based simply upon the language of the covenant, of course, because it has never been interpreted in actual practice. My understanding is that each member of the league is to have one delegate in the council and not to exceed three representatives in the assembly, who will be different persons from the man who sits in the council; but, in any case, no matter whether they have three or one in the assembly, they only cast one vote. Does that differ from the Senator's idea?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator call my attention to the article to which he refers?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was referring to article 26, to which the Senator previously referred.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems quite plain. It says "ratified by the members of the league whose representatives shall compose the council."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; "by the members of the league whose representatives shall compose the council," but the ratification is by the members of the league. Is it by the members of the league as represented in the assembly or in the council?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think in the assembly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I got the other idea from the Senator. I simply wanted to know whether he and I agreed about that or not.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] asked the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] if he could point out any case where the six votes of Great Britain, to put it in the short way—I mean the British Empire and the self-governing colonies—would operate to their advantage or against our advantage other than the one he indicated. I think this very article 26 furnishes such an instance. We must not only get a unanimous vote of all the members of the league who are represented in the council, but we must get a majority of all the other members in the assembly. Great Britain has six there, she and her colonies, and we have one. It is not a very large body. If there are 26 members of the league there will be 26 votes in the assembly. A majority would be 14, out of which Great Britain starts with nearly half, while we start with one.

Not only is the voting power of Great Britain six times our power, but the capacity to exercise influence upon the other members in the assembly is greater. Everybody knows that who has attended a caucus or convention. If you go alone to the caucus, you have nobody to make suggestions to you or to counsel with you. If you have six colleagues, you can send them all over the hall to carry suggestions and advice to the other delegates, and keep them advised of what you are going to do, and so forth. It goes without saying that a company of six anywhere is more potent than a company of one. In my opinion that is one of the most vital clauses of the covenant.

Mind you, it is the President's contention—it need not be asserted violently, either, because everybody admits it—that the council of this great world-governing power can do nothing except by unanimous consent. At times that is an element of great strength, when you do not want to do anything, because your single vote casts the whole world-governing power into impotency. At other times, when you do want to do something, that is a great disadvantage.

I have received some letters intimating—and it has been intimated upon the floor of the Senate—that, like every other document, the covenant itself has its imperfections and faults, but they are negligible as compared to the great benefits which will flow from it, and that at any rate no human document is ever perfect to start with, and any faults may be corrected in the light of experience after we get in and the door is locked behind us. Let us see. The only case in which the United States will ever consent to an amendment of this covenant, if we go into this combination, will be to correct some violation, to restrain the other members from doing what they are doing in the way they are doing it. If it works all right, nobody will want to amend it. It is when the shoe commences to pinch upon us that we will offer an amendment. That very situation shows what we are up against. The amendment necessarily is to be a restriction upon the parties who are operating the league from doing what they are doing. When those powers are conducting an operation which we say is wrong, and we want the covenant amended to restrain them, our remedy is to appeal for a unanimous vote to the very foreign powers who are claiming to act rightly and who are acting in their own interests, whether they are right or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just a moment. We ask them unanimously to vote to put in this covenant a provision which will prevent them from doing what they say they have a right to do and ought to do. I yield now to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no doubt that amendments may often be suggested under the circumstances supposed by the Senator from Connecticut, but he is himself the author of a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States under the provisions of which a proposed amendment should not go into effect until ratified by the votes of the people. It has no present application at all. There is no pending amendment to which it can have any application. The Senator is simply looking to the future. He is simply providing against a contingency that he thinks may arise. What is the reason for doubting that in the same way the covenant for a league of nations may be amended by some one who foresees possible complications that may arise in the future by reason of the imperfections in it and that have no bearing whatever upon any present exigency or controversy?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator ask me what is the reason for fearing?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What is the reason to doubt that some member of the council or assembly, actuated by the same motives which now prompt the Senator to propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, will be proposing amendments to take care of contingencies that he thinks may arise, but are not now imminent?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not have any doubt whatever that there will be a lot of amendments proposed, but I do not see the bearing of the Senator's question. I agree with him. I think at the first meeting of the assembly there will be plenty of amendments offered, because at the time it was adopted, according to the testimony before the Committee on Foreign Relations, there were 20 men who protested, though the chairman of the body said it was unanimously carried.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not at all unlikely. That is exactly the condition that confronted us at the time that the Constitution was adopted. Many people wanted amendments, and by practically unanimous consent of the entire country we adopted 10 amendments without delay.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What bearing does that have on what I was saying? I want to meet the Senator's idea and view.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to elucidate it. I understood the Senator to say that the hope which is entertained by some people that the covenant would be amended has no foundation. Of course, no amendment would be proposed until some controversy gave rise to a desire for the amendment, and thereupon unanimous consent could not be secured.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see what the Senator is driving at.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the impression that the Senator's argument left upon my mind.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will proceed, if I may, to correct the impression. What I meant to say, if I did not say it, was that we would only want an amendment when we desired to improve some condition for ourselves or to restrain some of the other powers that were acting in a way that we did not like. As I have said, I do not doubt there will be plenty of amendments proposed, but they can only be secured in any instance by unanimous consent of every power that has a vote in the council and a majority of all the other powers; and God knows how many there will be by the time the league is in operation. I believe there are 26 now. But I started to call attention to the fact that in that very vital matter Great Britain will have six times the power that we will have.

When independent sovereignties are going to enter a league to promote peace and good feeling, to say that we must start it on the basis of a six-to-one advantage in favor of the nation that drew the covenant and that has filled every office which has hitherto been established, from the general secretariat down to the private secretary, with an Englishman or a subject of Great Britain—to say that we enter this proposed league to promote peace on an equality with other sovereignties, when one of those sovereignties demands six times the voting power in the assembly that this nation of 110,000,000 people have, is preposterous.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My understanding about the matter is that Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa were represented in the peace council. Accordingly Great Britain had six times the voting power of the United States in the peace conference; but was the United States placed at any disadvantage? Was it possible to do anything, in view of the unanimity required, that did not meet the approval of the United States?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, my chief criticism of the whole covenant and the treaty is that the United States does not seem to get anything out of it at all except an obligation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have heard that statement before, and now I am curious to learn from the Senator from Connecticut just exactly what he would desire to have had the United States get out of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will tell the Senator one thing I should like to have us get out of it. I should like to have us get out of Europe and have our Army taken out of Europe for the purpose of keeping out of the infinity of obligations and embroilments and entanglements that are now going on in Europe. Why, the map of Europe looks like a kaleidoscope to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator's answer is negative; that is, he would not have had the league of nations. But the question is, What would he have had?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would have had peace. We did not enter this war to form any league of nations. I am familiar with the President's addresses in which he appeals to the soldier boys who were conscripted into the Army and sent over there to thrash the Germans under the orders of their superiors; I am familiar with the interpretation which the President says he can read in the hearts of those soldiers, that they fought for the things in which he or Gen. Smuts believed and put in this covenant; but if you ask the soldiers whether they had any such idea when they were trying to thrash the Germans they will tell you that they never heard of such a thing. I believe that nine-tenths of them are opposed to this program to-day.

Mr. President, as I have said, the process of amendment of this document is vital, because by the exercise of the process of amendment an entirely new covenant can be made. We want vital changes in the covenant; we are proposing them now on the floor of the Senate. There are certain amendments and certain reservations pending here in which every American in his heart believes; but we are told that we must not vote for them, not because they are not right, not because they are not necessary for the preservation of the independence of this country, not because they are not necessary for our protection under our form of government and to prevent the invasion of our Constitution, but because the adoption of such amendments or reservations might require that the treaty be resubmitted to the other nations that have signed it. That, to my mind, is a perfectly pusillanimous excuse.

Mr. President, if the President's statement is true that the league can not go into effect without America; that we are to stabilize the world; that the heart of humanity will be broken if we do no enter the league; that he has a mission and a call to lead America into this league for the purpose of leading the whole world—if that is true, how long do you suppose the nations that signed this treaty would hesitate if we said to them, "We would like at least to have the voting power that you have agreed Great Britain shall have?" If the life of those nations is dependent upon us, are they afraid of us? Read any one of the President's speeches and you will find that he says it is necessary for us to enter the league and assume the leadership of the world, because we are the only nation that those powers trust. If that is so, will they not trust us at least as much as they have trusted Great Britain? And they have given Great Britain six votes and given us but one.

We do not distrust Canada nor New Zealand nor Australia nor South Africa nor Great Britain; we do not distrust them any more than a man would distrust the partner with whom he was expecting to go into partnership; but they sign a contract for their mutual protection just the same. The great self-governing colonies of Great Britain are nations; yes, to be sure; but they all owe allegiance to the mother country, the British Empire. If people want to put up with this six-to-one preponderance of the British Empire on the theory that when the stress comes five-sixths of the British Empire is going to abandon the head of the Empire and vote with us, they are more trusting and confiding than I think it is patriotic to be.

Why should we not ask for this? In my opinion, if the Senate of the United States has the courage and patriotism to perform its manifest duty to-day, not to ask to take away from any one of the British colonies its vote on the ground that we distrust it, but to ask that we be put upon the same basis as the British Empire, and the President advises by cable, or even by wireless, Great Britain, Germany, France, Belgium, Italy, and Japan that we want six votes if Great Britain is going to have six, if they want us in the league they will agree to the request before you could count six. But my friends consider this document, which they say can be amended at any time, so sacrosanct and perfect they are not even willing to make the attempt to correct the manifest injustices, obliquities, and obscurities with which it abounds. It must no more be touched than the sacred ark of the covenant; not an "i" must be dotted nor a "t" crossed. Even to say that our Army shall not be sent abroad without the consent of Congress is to devitalize the whole league and cut its heart out, the President says.

Mr. President, I expect to vote for all the reservations and amendments the committee has reported, not because I am satisfied with the treaty or with the covenant of the league if the amendments and reservations are adopted, for I expect to vote against the whole treaty even if they are adopted, but I will vote for them on the theory that if we shall enter the league I want it to be as little dangerous as possible for this country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does not the Senator also intend to vote for them because he recognizes that their adoption will really kill the treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will not say if the President is sincere, as I think he is, but if there is any logic to be attached to the President's stand, and if his interpretation of article 10 is correct, to wit, that American troops can not be sent abroad in any event without the consent of Congress, then why does he object to our saying so?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Who proposes amendments under article 26?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The article does not state. The article provides that amendments shall take effect when ratified, and I assume that any member of the league may propose amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not the council or the assembly, but any member of the league may propose amendments. What authority in the United States, for instance, will ratify proposed amendments?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think that the article states that any authority in the United States is to ratify the amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Can the President ratify them, or would it require an act of Congress to ratify them, or would it require an election to ratify them?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the language of the article itself, I should not think amendments would require the ratification of any of the bodies named by the Senator, because it says amendments shall take effect when ratified by the members of the league.

Mr. CUMMINS. But suppose we are a member of the league and an amendment is proposed—by whom nobody knows—when would it be said to be ratified by the United States? What action would be required by any public authority in the United States to ratify it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. None whatever.

Mr. CUMMINS. Somebody representing the United States must ratify it or it could not take effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the Senator said "what authority in the United States."

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. None here; but sitting over in Geneva there would be whoever the President had appointed his delegate in the council or his representative or representatives in the assembly. When they had participated in the action of those bodies and those bodies had conformed to the requirements of article 26, the amendment would become a part of the covenant.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Montana agree with the Senator from Connecticut? Could our representatives sitting in the assembly or our representative sitting in the council ratify an amendment on the part of the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The language of the article is:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

Mr. CUMMINS. My question is, What action will be required on behalf of the United States to ratify an amendment which has been proposed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand that nations are the members of the league, and each nation would prescribe its own method of ratification.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the United States that is a member of the league.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not a representative sitting in the assembly or a representative sitting in the council; it is the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, how would the United States act in order to ratify an amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would act just as it acts in the case of any treaty; it would provide by an act of Congress how it should be ratified.

Mr. CUMMINS. How do we know at this time what action will be required in order to ratify?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We do not know. The Congress of the United States would provide the method of ratification; that is to say, the Congress has authority to carry it out so far as any action by the United States is concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Congress of the United States does not enter into the contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; but it represents the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. The President and the Senate enter into the contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a matter of no consequence. A treaty is carried out through an act of Congress wherever a government undertakes to do a thing or is required to do anything, as a matter of course. If, by any treaty, the Government of the United States is called upon to take any action——

Mr. CUMMINS. That has given me a good deal of concern, because my conclusion is that it practically nullifies the possibility of amendment; and that is not cured at all by the so-called Johnson amendment, because the Johnson amendment refers to equality of representation in the assembly, but there is no provision anywhere in the covenant that pretends to inform the world what action must be taken in order to ratify amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in my opinion, the Senator is entirely correct. It is one of the most important articles in the whole treaty. It is the article upon which the future of the treaty and all the duties of the league depend. As I say, the whole covenant can be made over again, and made into something entirely different from what it is now, by the exercise of the power of amendment under article 26.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. KING. As suggested by the Senator from Montana, this covenant, so far as this Government is concerned, becomes an accomplished fact if it is ratified by the Senate. It is a treaty, and will be ratified, possibly, by the Senate of the United States. Now, as the Senator from Montana states, you carry a treaty into effect by a legislative act subsequently or presently enacted; and it would seem to me very clear that any amendments to the treaty could only be effectuated by an act of Congress, because that would be in pursuance of the terms of a treaty, and it would be carrying into effect the terms that the treaty provided. It seems to me that there can not be any controversy as to the means by which this Government would signify its approval of an emendation of the covenant.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then by what authority would Great Britain signify it?

Mr. KING. Great Britain would signify its approval, I take it, by the same method that she signifies her approval now. She signifies her approval now by an act of Parliament.

Mr. CUMMINS. But she is not obliged to.

Mr. KING. There is some controversy as to that. There is one school of political thought in England that insists that this treaty could be carried into effect, so far as Great Britain is concerned, only by an act of Parliament. Others insist that it can be carried into effect by the vote of the ministry; that is, by those representing Great Britain at the Paris conference. I do not pretend to say which school of political thought in England is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. When we are entering into a world constitution, should there not be some more definite and understandable provisions with regard to the amendment of the constitution than are here provided?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why should there be anything more? We enter into a contract, for instance, with France by which the Government of the United States agrees to pay France $15,000,000. How shall it be paid? It shall be paid, as a matter of course, pursuant to our system of government. Suppose it to be otherwise. Suppose we enter into a contract with France by which France agrees to pay us $15,000,000. It might be that at that time France was an absolute monarchy, and the king of France could just draw his check.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not see any parallel between a treaty for the payment of money and the creation of a constitution for the government of the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Article 26 provides for the ratification of amendments by the United States, by Great Britain, by France, by Italy. Why should we go into the details of the constitution of each one of these several countries and tell how that ratification is to be accomplished under its peculiar institutions? The thing just simply provides that it must be ratified by these members.

Mr. CUMMINS. We ought, then, at least to provide that it shall be ratified by the legislative governments of the various countries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Suppose that we then encounter a perfectly autocratic government?

Mr. CUMMINS. My own judgment is that such a government ought not to be admitted to the league at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; but let us suppose, now, that we take the case of Italy, and we assume that the Italian constitution provides that no act shall be of any efficacy whatever except it is concurred in by the King and by the Parliament. Now, why should we undertake to interfere with the internal provisions of the Kingdom of Italy under which it expresses it governmental desire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no desire to interfere, and I think it would be very unwise to interfere with the internal affairs of these various countries. That is just why I am opposing certain parts of this treaty, because it is an interference with the internal affairs of these countries; but we can easily point out the general manner in which the treaty is to be ratified. I have heard it said that under article 26 the representatives of the United States, sitting in council or in assembly, could ratify, on behalf of the United States, an amendment to the league of nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator subscribe to that idea?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not. I do not know who would be required to express the ratification. I do not know whether it would be the President and the Senate, or the President and Congress, or whether it would be the representative appointed by the President to represent him in these matters. I say that if we are going to depend at all upon the process of amendment, we ought to be reasonably well assured with respect to the authority in our country, at least, that would be looked to for the purpose of ratification.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I undertake to say that if the Senator endeavored to incorporate in a provision of this character concerning amendments a general provision which should be applicable to all countries, he would find it exceedingly difficult to make one that would be applicable to the conditions of all of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that perfectly, and therefore I know that it was never intended that the treaty should be amended at all. It never will be amended in any matter that concerns the diverse interests of the various nations which enter into it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will follow that by the inquiry whether it was not a wise thing to provide, as it is provided, that it must be ratified by so many members holding seats in the council, and so many members holding seats in the assembly, leaving it to each particular country itself to devise a method of ratification consistent with its own constitution?

Mr. CUMMINS. What is consistent with its own constitution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That, of course, is another question. My idea is that so far as our Constitution is concerned, it is just the same as any other provision of a treaty which must be carried out by legislative action.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Constitution of the United States prescribes how amendments shall be proposed, and it prescribes how they shall be ratified.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, but, Mr. President, we are not amending the treaty. The treaty will be amended only in one way. The treaty itself provides how certain provisions thereof concerning the league of nations shall be changed, and we have agreed to that treaty. Now, we are not amending the treaty at all. We are simply carrying out the treaty; and the Congress of the United States carries out a treaty by appropriate legislation.

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends on whether it is a legislative act or an administrative act. Treaties are carried out by administrative acts as well as by legislative acts.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will allow me in his time, I simply wish to state that I have heard some of the most remarkable propositions advanced this afternoon, I think, that I have ever heard of in connection with treaties. I never knew before that in any way the Congress of the United States by legislative action could ratify a treaty. So far as concerns clarifying this matter and making it perfectly clear, it can be done by just five words, and yet the Senator from Montana seems to think that it could not be made to fit all countries. If it needs clarifying—in my judgment it does not—but if it needs clarifying, if after the word "ratified" you would simply write the words "as other treaties are ratified," it would then apply to every country, and every country would ratify it as it ratifies any other treaty. The ratification of a treaty is not a legislative act enforcing the treaty. The ratification of a treaty is not a legislative act at all and never was. It can not be.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is precisely why I wanted a little illumination upon this point.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is entirely correct; but in diplomacy, in law, in international law, in any book that I have ever heard of or read on the subject, the ratification of a treaty has a distinct meaning. Here it has a constitutional meaning as well as a legal meaning, and it is not an act of a legislative body, and never was. The carrying out of a treaty after it is ratified is a legislative act, possibly. If, as the Supreme Court has often declared, there is any condition subsequent to be performed, then the legislature performs that condition subsequent, and enacts legislation to carry it out. This is the ratification itself. The question which the Senator has raised, however, is a very serious one, as he has suggested, under our Constitution, because, as a matter of fact, the President of the United States ratifies a treaty under the Constitution of the United States. It never is a legislative act. The Senate of the United States by a two-thirds majority consents to the ratification of the treaty presented to it by the President, and the President exchanges the ratifications with the other nations. The President of the United States would ratify this treaty, undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the further we proceed the more obscure some of the provisions of this article appear to become. The language of article 26 is that—

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league—

And so forth.

Now, the members of the league are the countries that belong to the league. They are not the representatives in the assembly or in the council of the league. The members of the league are the countries that compose the league. This article says that amendments to this covenant shall take effect when ratified by the members; and the question is, How will the United States ratify an amendment to this covenant?

As the Senator from New Mexico says, the language of our Constitution does not use the word "ratify" at all with relation to our duty as to a treaty. The President exchanges the ratifications. The Senate advises and consents to the treaty. It may be that the word "ratify" has been loosely written in there. It may be that the sense of that word is what it would be if they had said, "These amendments shall take effect when approved by the members of the league."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he draws any distinction between the point presented by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and my colleague. If I understand it, my colleague took the position that an amendment to the covenant would be an amendment to the treaty, whereas the Senator from Montana took the position that an amendment to the covenant would only be an act in pursuance of the treaty and in accordance with the covenant, and would not constitute an amendment to the treaty at all. Therefore any suggestion as to how treaties are to be ratified would not apply to this provision, which is an act under and in pursuance of a treaty or covenant. I think the way the Senator from Montana and my colleague view the proposition is wholly different, and I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut which view he takes with regard to it. Would such an act under this provision be an act in pursuance of the covenant and in pursuance of the treaty, or does he consider that it would be an amendment of the treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that is a pretty long question for me to carry in my mind, but I will endeavor to give my view on the general subject proposed, and the Senator can correct me on any particular point of it.

Of course, this covenant which we are discussing is part 1 of the treaty. It is a part of the treaty of peace with Germany, although, in my opinion, it is utterly unrelated to it and ought never to have been a part of it. Still, it is there, and it has been ratified by the other Governments. Being a part of the treaty, article 26 of the covenant provides for amendments to the covenant, "Amendments to this covenant will take effect." Of course, if you amend the covenant, which is a part of the treaty, you amend the treaty of which it is a part. That goes without saying.

The amendments will take effect when ratified by the members. Ratified how? The Senator from Montana, if I understand him, says ratified by a legislative act, an act of Congress, requiring the assent of both branches of Congress, because he says laws passed to carry out provisions of a treaty, of course, are passed by Congress.

But, Mr. President, viewing this matter quickly and offhand, as it has arisen here unexpectedly, I should not consider that this was a law to carry out the provisions of the treaty at all. It purports to be an amendment to the treaty, and if it is an amendment to the treaty to be ratified or to be approved by the various members of the league I should think it would have to be approved by the same method in which the original treaty was approved, because it is a part of the treaty, and I should not think the House of Representatives would have anything to do with it, and I should not think it was the passage of a statute at all. I do not think you could ratify such an amendment by a joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, Mr. President, if that be true, it would be ratified, would it not, in the same way that other amendments were ratified, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it takes the course that the treaty takes, it would have to be signed by the President and transmitted to the Senate, I assume, and secure a two-thirds vote of the Senate for its ratification.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If that interpretation should prevail, would there be any embarrassment, so far as the United States is concerned? If the interpretation placed upon it by the Senator from Montana obtains, then it would be done in pursuance of an act of Congress. So it seems to me it is not a matter of any very great consequence. The United States would find some method of ratifying the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course, with all due respect to the House of Representatives, my understanding is that the House would have nothing whatever to do with an amendment to a treaty. That would fall under the treaty-making power provided in the Constitution, which consists of the President and the Senate. I may be wrong about that. That is as to the process of ratification, which is very important, of course. But that is not the point to which I arose. The covenant itself, to those who have read it carefully and studied it carefully, of whom there are not very many in this country, although many have expressed their views about the general policy of some sort of a league, all assuming that they all promote peace, because large numbers of them prefer to believe that they will—is exceedingly loosely drawn, and is full of ambiguities and obscurities, a few of which we are going to try to clear up, if we dare to exercise the constitutional powers which have been conferred upon us.

Mr. President, I do not want to move to adjourn if any Senator desires to speak.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to make a short statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield the floor?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I notice that several of the morning papers have included me in a group of Republican Senators known as mild reservationists. Just what is meant by the term "mild reservationist" I have yet to find out. If it is anything mild in regard to the protection of American rights, they can count me out. There are a few Senators, mostly on this side of the Chamber, high-minded, patriotic men, who are openly in favor of defeating the ratification of the peace treaty. Especially are they against having the United States become a member of the league of nations. From the time of the publication of the first draft of the league covenant they have been steadily proclaiming the iniquities of the covenant, and in my opinion their objections to it are in the main well founded.

In fact, Mr. President, there is not an objection raised by them that would not have been taken care of in the treaty had we had anyone at the peace conference to look after the interests of the American people.

These objections are centered principally upon the four following questions:

First, the right of the United States to withdraw from the league. Second, article 10. Third, the right of the United States to settle all domestic questions. Fourth, the Monroe doctrine.

On account of the provisions of the league covenant in regard to these four matters these few Senators have been and are against having the United States enter the league of nations. Others of us, recognizing these objections and their evident merit, have believed that the objections could be obviated and the rights of the United States protected without leaving the United States out of the league by the inserton of reservations applying to the United States in the ratifying clause of the treaty.

The difficulty has been in getting together the people who want reservations and in reconciling the various differing views of Senators. The reservations given out by the Committee on Foreign Relations are, I think, satisfactory to most of us reservationists, with the possible exception of a slight change as to article 10. I personally should have preferred to cut out article 10 entirely, but this may not be done by a reservation, and I shall therefore be satisfied with a reservation which takes away any obligation moral or otherwise on the part of the United States to make war to preserve the integrity of any member of the league.

I want no mild reservations but clear strong ones which can not fail to protect the United States. I have steadily refused to accept any reservations which did not in my opinion have this effect, and, as I have said on the floor of the Senate, I shall not vote for the treaty unless such reservations are adopted.

The few Senators opposed to ratification have introduced amendments in regard to other matters in the treaty, namely, the Johnson amendment in regard to the votes of self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire, the Shantung amendment, and the Fall amendments in regard to our holding places on the various commissions provided in the treaty.

I am entirely in sympathy with these amendments, but as in the case of the league of nations I believe we can take care of them by equally strong reservations instead of by amendments. We are trying to work out reservations amply covering these matters, and I believe shall succeed in doing so. I believe that the people of this country want to see the peace treaty ratified with the interests and participation on the part of the United States protected by strong reservations. I believe that they want to see it done as expeditiously as possible, and that they will neither tolerate any unreasonable delay on the part of the Senate in performing its duties in regard to the treaty, nor any refusal on the part of the President to perform his part of the contract when the Senate shall have so acted.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I move, as in legislative session, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 27, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate September 26, 1919.

COAST GUARD.

Senior Capt. William Edward Reynolds to be captain commandant of the Coast Guard.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 26, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

By Thy grace, our Father in heaven, inspire us to consecrate ourselves anew to the work Thou hast given us to do, that with patience, perseverance, diligence and efficiency we may press forward toward the mark of the high calling of God, in Christ Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is private pension day, but owing to the fact that there is no prospect of these pension bills passing the Senate until very late in the session, and in order not to interfere with other business, I think it best to state that all pension matters will go over for the present.

THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SECOND INFANTRY.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing some correspondence with the Secretary of War and a report that I have received from him in regard to the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry, a subject discussed on the floor several days ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, upon what subject did the gentleman say?

Mr. McCULLOCH. It is correspondence with the Secretary of War in regard to the Three hundred and thirty-second Infantry. The Secretary of War thought the report should be in the RECORD. Not having included it in my remarks, I am asking unanimous consent that I may put it in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, may I ask whether the gentleman has submitted the matter to the gentleman from Massachusetts for his approval?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Of course I have not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

JAMES A. DUFFY AND LOUISE HARRIS.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT TO ACCOMPANY HOUSE RESOLUTION 303.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution 303 authorizing payment from the contingent fund to the clerks to the late JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, a Representative in Congress from the State of Oklahoma at the time of his death, having had the same under consideration, find that the resolution carries out the custom and practice of the House in such cases and recommends its adoption.

House resolution 303.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to James A. Duffy and Louise Harris the sums of $161.67 and $145, respectively, the same being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late JOSEPH B. THOMPSON, a Representative in Congress from the State of Oklahoma at the time of his death, September 18, 1919.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the report says that the committee concludes that this carries out the practice and custom of the House. Does the gentleman contend that because the clerks and stenographers have been put on the rolls that they should now be treated as other House employees?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the House employees, to some extent at least, who have been on the rolls, have been paid compensation, or their relatives upon their death have been paid six months' compensation. Of course the new provision relative to the pay of the secretaries to Members has just gone into effect, but the committee thought that it would be fair to continue the practice of giving the secretaries to the Congressman the usual one month's pay after the death of the Congressman.

Mr. WALSH. And include them both.

Mr. MAPES. And include them both.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSENGER AND ASSISTANT PAIR CLERK.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I present another privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT TO ACCOMPANY HOUSE RESOLUTION 253.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution 253 providing for the services of an additional messenger and assistant pair clerk, whose appointment and removal shall be subject to the Sergeant at Arms, have had the same under consideration. The committee finds that with the increased volume of work of the House that there is necessity for the appointment of the additional employees referred to in order to maintain the height of efficiency demanded. The committee therefore recommends the adoption of the resolution.

House resolution 253.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $1,800 per annum for the services of an additional messenger and assistant pair clerk, whose appointment and removal shall be subject to the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What great urgency has arisen to make another messenger and pair clerk necessary?

Mr. MAPES. The information before the committee was that this was necessary. The minority Members have a pair clerk and an assistant pair clerk, but for some years the majority has had only one pair clerk, and the committee thought that inasmuch as the majority Members had more work to do or at least had more Members than the minority, it should provide for this additional assistance for the majority.

Mr. WALSH. It is a fact that some six or eight years ago there were two for each side of the House.

Mr. MAPES. There are two for the minority now.

Mr. WALSH. This is to restore it and make both sides equal. Is the compensation the same as that paid to the minority employee?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. In further reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts the Sergeant at Arms shows that this man is absolutely needed to carry on the business and that the pair clerk is put to great hardship by reason of the fact that he has not an assistant.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the two votes by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the people of the country were astonished this morning on reading in their newspapers that we are at war with Italy. It was most startling to discover that American soldiers had won a victory over Italian troops. I have no knowledge that we have declared war upon Italy or upon any faction in Italy, and yet it is reported that our arms are engaged against the people of that country. I wish some one in executive authority would tell the country under what law or authority this action is being taken. It is time, I assert, that the people of the United States should have some knowledge of the authority upon which the Executive undertakes war activities against a Government with which this country is not at war. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is not that the condition in Russia as well?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That has been stated upon the floor a great many times, and a state of unauthorized war still exists in Russia. But this is a new action initiated evidently by the Executive against another country with which we are at peace and which until yesterday has been one of our allies.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. KNUTSON. Under the covenant which it is proposed to enter into, of course, we will have to do these things right along.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; but that is aside from the question; I now rise to ask by what authority are we at war with Italy?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. What authority does the gentleman have for stating that we are at war with Italy?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is announced in the press dispatches that our troops landed in Dalmatia and drove the Italians out.

Mr. BLACK. Has the gentleman the authority of the State Department for that statement, or has he merely read it in newspaper reports. Is it authoritative of his own knowledge?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does my friend from Texas deny that our troops landed in Dalmatia and drove the Italians out as stated on yesterday?

Mr. BLACK. I am making no assertion at all, but I am seeking to know by what authority the gentleman speaks when, as a Representative, he charges on the floor of the House that the United States is at war with Italy when he discloses by his answer to the interrogatory that he has no knowledge except a newspaper report.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER, NEAR CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2910 and pass it as it is reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table—the Chair is informed that it is not on the Speaker's table.

Mr. MOON. The bill came over from the Senate with a Senate report, and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has reported to the House an identical bill.

Mr. WALSH. A bridge bill?

Mr. MOON. Yes. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts want an explanation of it? I will state to him that the road running from the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, to Chattanooga——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that the bill has been referred to the committee, so the gentleman's remedy would be to move to discharge the committee and consider the bill.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, if that is the status, I now make that motion.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understood the bill was still on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds it is not on the Speaker's table, and that the committee has not yet reported.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the committee reported the House bill?

Mr. MOON. The committee has reported the House bill, which is identical. I have a copy here.

Mr. MONDELL. But have they reported it, so that it is on the calendar?

Mr. MOON. I understand it is on the calendar; yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, does the gentleman know?

Mr. MOON. Here is the bill reported and referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the House bill is not on the House Calendar and the Senate bill has been referred to the committee, I think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to withhold his request for one day.

Mr. MOON. It is on the House Calendar. It is a House bill. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Senate bill, and that it be now considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the Senate bill, a House bill of identically the same tenor having been reported favorably by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved April 5, 1916, authorizing the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I desire to say anything further and I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. MOON, a House bill of similar tenor was ordered to lie on the table.

GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING AND ADMIRAL R. E. COONTZ.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House will remember that a very short time ago we conferred the rank of permanent full general on Gen. John J. Pershing, the great Missourian. There was also a proposition that was never put to a vote to give him a sword.

I desire to make two announcements. The people of Missouri are going to raise a fund to present Gen. Pershing with the finest sword that can be made in Toledo or any other place on the face of the earth. [Applause.] The movement has been started by Mr. Frederick G. Bonfils, owner and editor of the Kansas City Post and the Denver Post, and who started it with a contribution of $500 himself.

In the second place, I wish to announce that another great Missourian, Admiral R. E. Coontz, of Hannibal, Mo., appointed to the Annapolis Academy by the late Col. William Hatch, long a prominent Member of the House, has, in the last few days, been made the head and ranking officer of the American Navy. [Applause.]

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when we reach section 503, that at any time to the end of the bill I may have 15 minutes, which I may or may not use.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when section 503 of the dyestuff bill is reached, he may be allowed to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8078.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 6, line 14, after the word "pound," strike out the proviso down to and including the word "pound," in line 25, and on page 7, line 15, after the word "particular," strike out all of lines 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will turn to page 6 they will observe the proviso beginning on line 14, an extremely technical provision, very difficult to understand, written not by the ordinary legislator, but written by some scientific expert interested in the business. You will observe that provision is made for the standardization of colors, compounds, dyestuffs, standardization as to strength, all of which is to be effectuated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

We have started, as Republicans at least, to dispense with the innumerable bureaus that were created by our friends on the other side and by us during the war. This bill proposes, and the whole crux of the bill is, the creation of a dye-licensing commission, a new institution to be operated at the expense of the Government. The main purpose of the bill is to create a commission at the expense of the taxpayers which will have the effect of reducing the revenue by preventing imports into this country.

But here in section 501, in this proviso, preparation is made for a new commission to be created by the Secretary of the Treasury, a commission on standardization. The Bureau of Standards is not to be called in. That is a fixed bureau of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury is to have the power here to provide for the standardization of these dyes, and they are not to be admitted into the country except at the standards fixed by him.

I am told by those who know more about dyestuffs than I do that it is positively impossible to effectuate the standardization of dyes as proposed in this paragraph, because of their constantly changing nature, and that it would take years to get the machinery in order and to find the experts qualified to standardize these particular dyes, running up into the thousands and tens of thousands.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to know where the gentleman finds in this paragraph any provision to prohibit the importation of any dyes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have already made the statement in other speeches that this bill is in effect a prohibition bill. The tariff rates in this bill are prohibitive in themselves. I am told by importers that they can not operate under this bill; that we will not get a cent of revenue out of imports under this bill, because the rate is fixed so high that it will be impossible to import dyes into the United States. There are four or five other ways now under control of the Government by which dyes can be kept out of the United States. I have charged that this dye-licensing commission is to be created for the purpose of preventing American manufacturers from obtaining dyes except upon their conditions, and those conditions, I have heretofore argued, are being made by the American manufacturers of dyes, who have consolidated themselves and who proposed to charge their own price and fix their own terms to the consumers.

Now, here is a paragraph which goes away beyond anything that anybody dreamed of when we attempted to deal with it legislatively—a provision that you can not get the dyes now unless they correspond to certain standards set up by the Secretary of the Treasury—an entirely new agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to continue for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If you want to give the ordinary purchaser of dyes, this man who stands for $3,000,000,000 worth of business in the United States, involving all the textiles that you and your families use, the chance to go on with his business, take that paragraph out. Because if those in control of this commission, once appointed, insist on the enforcement of that proviso, the Secretary of the Treasury becomes the last court of appeal, and you get no dyes at all unless they conform to the standards set up by him. But he can not get the machinery to set up business; he can not get the machinery because of the constantly changing condition of the dyes, the grades, the colors, and the contents that are desired by manufacturers in order that they may make their business profitable.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Does not the Secretary of the Treasury use dyes? Is he not an expert on that in using dyes on money, on bills?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It takes dyes to manufacture ink. I can appreciate the humor of the gentleman from North Dakota in asking that question in that way; but I insist that the Secretary of the Treasury is not an expert on dyes, although he may use some of them in the course of the conduct of his official business. But he should not be set up here, through a board organized for that purpose, in addition to the War Board and the allied council and the other organizations, to further complicate the situation that now confronts the American consumer of dyes.

I think, gentlemen, you can strike this paragraph out without any fear of doing any harm to any American interest. I think you can strike that out with the complete understanding with yourself that you are releasing business from an entangling alliance here that it ought not to be subjected to. You can strike that out with the idea that you are lessening the present autocratic Government control over the business of the people of the United States. That paragraph ought not to be in, and if it goes out, with the few lines on page 7 relating to its enforcement by the Secretary of the Treasury, and compelling the standards of strength which can only be enforced and agreed upon after years and years of consultation with experts and chemists, you will be doing a very good thing. It ought not to be in the bill, and I trust, gentlemen, that you will vote "aye" on this proposition to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have been aware of the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is opposed to the revenue features of this bill. I was aware that he was opposed to the features regarding license, but not to the revenue features.

The object of this paragraph is to prevent frauds on the revenue. It is for that purpose, and for that purpose only. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that it was drafted by some scientific expert interested in the business. Upon what authority he makes that statement I have no conception. The provision was drafted by the Tariff Commission after two years' careful study of this entire proposition. It is one of the main features of this bill, so far as revenue producing is concerned, and if you strike it out you will lose thousands of dollars of revenue and confer benefit upon no human being except the German dye maker who seeks to defraud the revenue.

I want to read to you the reason given by the Tariff Commission as to the necessity of this provision, and I ask your attention to this:

A third possibility of evasion—

And the draft of this provision was for the purpose of preventing evasions of its provisions by importers, and particularly for the German trust—

A third possibility of evasion, or, if not evasion, of unexpected complication, arises from the circumstances that dyes as ordinarily dealt with in commerce are in most cases not dyes in a chemically pure form, but are weakened or reduced in strength by mixing with water, salts, or other diluent. Snythetic indigo, for instance, is ordinarily sold in the form of a paste, containing 20 per cent of pure indigo and 80 per cent of inert matter, chiefly water. In the case of other dyes also, including most of the important ones, there is a recognized standard commercial strength. Prices are habitually quoted on the basis of this usual strength. In the case of still other dyes, however, there is no recognized commercial strength. The duty of 5 cents per pound, imposed by the act of 1916, was presumably intended to apply to the dyes in their usual commercial strength, and not to the pure forms which ordinarily are unknown in commerce. The wording was, however, not so framed as to insure this. Under the present wording of the law the duty is levied, and apparently must be levied, on the weight of the dye as imported, regardless of its concentration or strength.

Note this:

This permits dyes to be imported in a pure state, or at least a highly concentrated state, and then to be reduced to the usual commercial strength after having passed through the customhouse. The effective duty is consequently much lower than was presumably intended.

This situation, however, can not be dealt with by any specific legislative prescription of the commercial or standard strength of the several dyes. In many cases no trustworthy basis now exists for a definite standardization of commercial strength. Under these circumstances, the commission believes it best that discretion be given to the administrative department and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to determine from time to time what is the dutiable strength of the several dyes, with discretion to make changes in accord with gradually ascertained and tested commercial practice. Discretionary power of this sort will enable experts to recommend to the Secretary of the Treasury standards of strength conforming approximately to commercial usage, with the possibility of modifying them as experience might indicate.

This mode of dealing with the situation would be facilitated by requiring a statement on all imported packages of the exact constituents and strength of dyestuffs contained therein. Such a statement would make easier the accurate appraisal of imports of dyes for the ad valorem duty. Appraisal is exceptionally difficult owing to the difficulty of identification and variability in strength. The requirement would serve further as a guarantee to purchasers of the identity and strength of the dyestuffs which they were buying. The commission is satisfied that there has been much dishonesty in the dyestuffs trade and that something analogous to the provision of the pure-food laws in regard to misbranding would be of great advantage. It is accordingly recommended, both as an aid in administering the law and as a safeguard for purchasers, that every imported package shall contain a specific statement showing the constituents and strength of the contents.

As a matter of fact, gentlemen, most of the dyes that are being imported to-day, and which will continue to be imported for some time to come, until our industry gets fully on its feet, are what are generally known as the vat dyes, which are used commercially in a solution in which the color itself is only 12½ per cent. In other words, if the Germans desire to defraud the revenue, as they always do, they will import that dye in a 100 per cent solution and will avoid the payment of seven-eighths of the duty.

Is not that perfectly clear? When the Deutschland, the submarine, came over to this country, bringing German dyes, they were imported in a 100 per cent solution, thereby avoiding the duty to the extent of 90 per cent, practically. Those dyes, in order to be used commercially for dyeing cotton, had to be diluted until the actual strength of the color was only 12½ per cent. Dyes are imported in various degrees of dilution, and the same dye is often imported under different names.

That is another trick that the Germans have of defrauding the revenue. Take one instance of dyes of the same material exactly, so far as the color strength is concerned, coming in from Germany under three different names and produced in three different factories. In one case it is known as "Diazo black, B. H.

N. extra "—whatever that means. In another factory it is called "Diannine blue, B. H." In another factory it is called "Solamine blue, B. H." These dyes are all exactly the same material, but of different degrees of concentration; but they do not pay the same duty. The one of the highest degree of concentration pays the least duty, naturally.

The object of this bill is to see to it and provide that those same substances pay the same duty, and that the Germans can not defraud the United States Treasury. That is all there is in this proposition, gentlemen. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the information he has to-day at hand, will be able to prescribe standards of strength for a large portion of the dyes that are being brought in, and in a very short time will be able to make the same regulations with regard to others.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says it will take five years to make these regulations. From his own argument, if it will take five years, it would not do any harm for five years. But the only harm it can do is harm to the German trust. Bear that in mind. Gentlemen, if you strike out this provision from this bill, the German dye trust will give three cheers, because it will enable them, under the law as it stands now, to defraud the United States Treasury out of millions of dollars a year, just as they have defrauded us from the beginning, when they had entire control of the American market.

It is as simple as A, B, C—the proposition that the same coloring material ought to pay the same rate of duty, no matter in what form it is brought in. If you strike this provision out of the bill, it will enable the German trust to defraud the United States Treasury out of seven-eighths of the duty to which it is entitled, simply because they will concentrate these vat dyes into 100 per cent solutions, when the commercial use of them is in a solution in which the actual coloring matter is only 12½ per cent. This proposition is to prevent fraud and fraud only, and you are not justified in striking it from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 502. That paragraphs 20, 21, 22, 23, 179, 394, 452, and 514; and the provision for salicylic acid in paragraph 1; and provisions for salol, phenolphthalein, acetanilid, acetphenetidin, antipyrine, acetylsalicylic acid, and aspirin in paragraph 18; and the provision for benzoate of soda in paragraph 67; and the provisions for carbolic and phthalic acids in paragraph 387 of an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, are hereby repealed: Provided, That all articles which may come within the terms of paragraphs 1, 5, 37, 46, 63, 501, and 538 of said act of October 3, 1913, as well as within the terms of Group I, II, or III of section 500 of this act, shall be assessed for duty or exempted from duty, as the case may be, under this act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I offer an amendment of a technical nature.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 8, line 8, after the figure "5," insert the figures "14" and "29."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio why he offers that amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is an amendment recommended by the Tariff Commission in order to make clear the paragraphs referred to, simply to supply two missing paragraphs which were omitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On yesterday I put in the RECORD a letter from the La France Manufacturing Co., using it merely for purposes of illustration to show that that company was unable to obtain the dyes with which to do business. Some days ago I referred this matter to the War Trade Board, and appealed to them to tell my constituents where to go to get raw materials with which to proceed. This morning I was in receipt of a letter from the War Trade Board which, I think, in view of the statement made a moment ago by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], should be read to the House. The gentleman from Ohio still insists that the licensing feature of this bill is necessary, notwithstanding that the bill carries the highest tariff rates ever placed in a dyestuff bill, to keep out German imports, disregarding the fact that imports come from all other countries that manufacture dyes, particularly Switzerland, France, and England.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand the gentleman was a supporter of the Hill bill as originally drawn?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I certainly was.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the duties provided in the original Hill bill as introduced were greater than those in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not as written into law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As introduced by Mr. Hill; and the gentleman just stated that he was a supporter of the original Hill bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was a supporter of the original Hill bill; but I say, what the gentleman will not deny, that this bill carries higher rates than were ever enacted in this country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know; but the gentleman supported the Hill bill, and now he is complaining of the higher rates in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not complaining of the higher rates; I am for them, but against the licensing feature.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman claim these rates are too high?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Hill bill was passed before we entered the war. The gentleman has been constantly "harping on my daughter," Germany, Germany, Germany! That appeals to Americans still. We licked Germany. That is over. This bill ought to be passed on its merits, not with regard to a war that is past. This bill ought to be passed with regard to American interests. That is what I am fighting for here, the right of American manufacturers to do business in this country. We are no longer afraid of Germany. We have settled that question, at least up to the point where the President might issue a proclamation of peace if he cared to do it.

But I was referring to this letter, which is a practical proposition relating to the desire of American manufacturers to get dyestuffs, which this bill proposes to prevent them from getting in certain instances. Here is what the War Trade Board, which I have criticized heretofore, say on this subject:

WAR TRADE BOARD,
Washington, September 25, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of September 20, with the inclosure from the La France Manufacturing Co. regarding the importation of certain dyes from Germany, has been received.

Here is the very administration that wants to pass this bill, and wants prohibition here, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] seems to want prohibition.

The War Trade Board section of the Department of State is making arrangements for a sufficient amount of vat dyes to supply the country's needs, and we have every reason to suppose that this supply will soon become available to our manufacturers.

Now, why are they making this arrangement? They are going to get vat dyes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] fears Germany. Are these vat dyes that the administration is now seeking coming from Germany? They must be, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is right. Either they must be coming from Germany or coming from another country which stands between us and Germany. The gentleman from Ohio has heard me comment time and again upon the fact that the supreme allied council, which has headquarters in London and Paris, is controlling this situation. From whom is this administration, under this War Trade Board, getting these vat dyes? Is it going under cover to Germany, the country which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] fears so much, or is it going to Great Britain, and letting Great Britain do this business for us? Is it a subterfuge? What if Great Britain is to pass these dyes over to us after this supreme allied council, either in London or Paris, gets the dyes from Germany? What are we going to pay here in excess of what their manufacturers pay there? Are they to have the first chance at this industry?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are they to have a chance over there to get control of this key raw material? If so, then they will go on and manufacture, while we wait over here until this board, which is endeavoring to force certain dyes upon us, gets ready to give the American manufacturer his dyes. What are Republicans in this House thinking about, those who have stood for protection to American industries, when they want to leave it to this supreme council, with which the War Trade Board of the United States is now negotiating, to let every foreign competitor of ours have dyes to go on with the manufacturing of fabries that are sent into the United States, while our mills are waiting here for the raw materials?

I am not making the fight here to take care exclusively of the Du Pont or the National Chemical Co., or a few other companies tied up with them in this matter. I am fighting for the American manufacturers who want a square deal in competition with the English manufacturers, the French manufacturers, and the German manufacturers. Can the Republicans get this under their skulls? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I am talking as much for the information of the gentleman from North Carolina, who has recently come in for tariff bills, as I am for gentlemen on this side. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I am mighty glad to see the gentleman from Pennsylvania opposing tariff bills now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice that a bill has been introduced to put a tariff duty on graphite which is produced in Alabama and that section of the country. Of course, before the war they all wanted free trade down there, but when the war came on and they began to make money they said bar the foreigner, put a duty on the commodities; we want protection in North Carolina and Alabama as you do in Pennsylvania.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman does not mean to convey the idea that the Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee support that bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], spokesman for the White House, and as much of a Democrat as any man on that side.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not get up to get the gentleman off his subject. I am asking for information. The gentleman was reading a letter from the War Trade Board.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not finished it yet.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to ask the gentleman for information——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from North Carolina is one of the most pleasing characters in this House, and when the gentleman is on the floor he is invincible and unanswerable, because he does not permit a break in his speech.

Mr. KITCHIN. Seriously, I understood that the War Trade Board is bringing in these vat dyes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. German dyes, and I think they are bringing them in through the administration of the supreme allied council over yonder which is dominated from Paris and London.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman approves of the action of the War Trade Board in permitting vat dyes to come into this country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it will prevent the shutting down of the American mills, yes. I want them put in a position to compete with those fellows on the other side. I want the mills growing up in the gentleman's State of North Carolina, employing thousands of people, to be able to compete with the mills abroad. If we permit the dyes to be used by our competitors in England, France, and Germany before we get them, the mills in North Carolina and Pennsylvania will not be able to compete with those in foreign countries.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself agree as to the action of the War Trade Board.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They have been compelled to do it to save the industries in the United States.

Now, I will continue with the reading of the letter. It is just as important to the State of North Carolina that has the cotton mills; it is just as important to the manufacturers of hosiery in Mississippi. They are getting wise to the situation. They can not always export cotton and depend on foreign money to keep things going down there. They are becoming industrial, they are building mills, they have the same interest that you have in North Carolina and that I have in Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. These men are thinking on that question. If dyestuffs is the key to the textile trade involving $3,000,000,000——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These men on the other side who are our competitors have been a little wiser in diplomacy all through the war; they have not missed a trick in holding trade all through the war while we have been fighting for them. How, then, are you going to keep the mills going in North Carolina and Georgia; how are we going to keep them going in New England, if they get the raw materials ahead of us? It is as vital to you as it is to us. The War Trade Board has autocratic power in this matter. In this instance it has the common sense and good business sense to permit dyes to come in, so that our wheels of industry can turn.

I continue the reading of this letter:

> The War Trade Board section of the Department of State is making arrangements for a sufficient amount of vat dyes to supply the country's needs, and we have every reason to suppose that this supply will soon become available to our manufacturers.
> This is the only class of dyes which are not made in this country in sufficient amounts to supply the domestic needs. There are, however, certain other colors belonging to the many other classes of dyes which are not made in this country at all or which are not produced as yet in sufficient quantity.

Do you get that, my friends? Here is the War Trade Board admitting every contention I have made on this floor.

> We are making up a list of these with the expectation of arranging for the importation of these as soon as the more pressing need for the vat dyes have been arranged for.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does not that letter refer to the dyestuffs requested of this commission in April last?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And they have not got them yet?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I continue reading:

> We note with particular interest what your correspondent, the La France Manufacturing Co., has to say about patent acid blue. Only one manufacturer has been reported to us as making this color at this time, and, although he is increasing his output, there possibly is a shortage which would be relieved by importation. It might be of interest to your correspondent to know that this one manufacturer is the Chemical Co. of America (Inc.), 28 Platt Street, New York City.
> We shall make a particular note of this dye, and, if possible, permit its importation as soon as the arrangements have been made in Europe.
> Very truly, yours,
> BUREAU OF IMPORTS,
> W. B. D. PENNIMAN, Trade Advisor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the time remaining to me I want to make a statement somewhat startling in its nature. I have information on my desk this morning that the Alien Property Custodian, though the war is over and we are all waiting for the proclamation of peace, on yesterday gave notice to an American citizen born in this country, formerly a Member of this House, that his property, two large factories that had served this country throughout the war, that had furnished it with the material that it could not get elsewhere for the medical treatment of our men, must turn those two businesses over to the Alien Property Custodian, whose relations with this trust and this Chemical Foundation (Inc.) have been referred to several times on this floor. This official may have his reasons, but it seems fair to ask when this system of espionage, this system of domination by the Alien Property Custodian over business, in this country is to cease. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just spoken in his criticism upon the War Trade Board, that the control of the War Trade Board over importations of dyes ought to be abolished, and we propose to abolish it by this bill. That in itself, I think, ought to be a sufficient answer. Now, what has the War Trade Board been doing? It has been applied to by the dye consumers of this country to import dyes. The board admitted and conceded that those dyes ought to be imported, that the textile business could not be carried on unless those importations were made; but instead of granting permits to make these importations, as has been stated in the newspapers, what they were doing was to send Dr. Herty over to Europe to see about having importations made there in such quantities as he saw fit and under such circumstances as he might deem proper. I also agree with the gentleman in what he says with reference to this conference which is being held abroad and which is apportioning, as I understand, a certain amount of dyes to England, a certain amount to France, and possibly a certain amount to this country. I have no sympathy whatever for that proceeding, but all this has no application to the board which is proposed to be created by this bill or any board that is likely to be provided for when the bill is finished. The War Trade Board is governed by no rules. It is controlled by no regulations; it is under no law except the law which created it and the direction of the President. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania correctly stated, it is an autocrat unto itself. It determines whatever it may see fit and may proceed entirely according to the whim or impulse of any of its members; but that will not be the case with any board created in this bill. It will proceed under definite rules and under established law and under regulations that must control its actions. Its members will be subject to impeachment and removal if they do not act in that manner.

Now, I want to say just a word further with reference to another party that he mentions, a former Member of this House, whom he said was being oppressed by the Alien Property Custodian. Well, I think all the members of the Ways and Means Committee know very well who that gentleman was and who he is. They also know what he has done with reference to taking German property. This same man was found by the courts to have in his possession German property, claiming all the time that he had bought and purchased and paid for it, whereas as a matter of fact he had never paid one cent for it, and the whole proceeding was merely a camouflage to cover up this German ownership. He finally surrendered that particular property and paid, as I recollect, some $40,000 in penalties for his having received it. Now, as I understand, the Alien Property Custodian claims he has got some more German property. Whether that is correct or not, I do not know, but I should think very likely from the past record of the gentleman—in any event, I have little sympathy for him in the predicament in which he now finds himself. He is open to very strong suspicions. So that all of these matters, it seems to me, have no bearing upon the question which is now before the committee, or the board which is to be created by it, except to show that these criticisms are in the main fanciful and the result of imagination rather than real objections to the enactment of the bill.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to know if there is any objection to informing the Members of this House a little more completely than has been done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Iowa? Is there any objection to giving us more complete information? We are getting it in little bits. It has been hinted that somebody did something, and everybody seems to be furnishing information like a rat running around a bit of cheese in a trap. Can we not get the information which you gentlemen possess instead of having it hinted at?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] mentions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, what is the subject of conversation between my colleague and the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. JUUL. I will say that the gentlemen have in their speeches been hinting about gentlemen who have violated the law, former Members of this House. We are on the border of finding out something, but they keep hinting without telling us anything definite.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. On what subject?

Mr. JUUL. On the subject of a former Member who has done something that he ought not to do. What is it about?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think it has anything to do with the bill whatever.

Mr. JUUL. Then how does it come into the debate?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will answer that. He brought it up.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] followed it up by telling further about it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I did, in explaining the situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will tell the gentleman. Mr. Herman A. Metz, former comptroller of the State of New York and a former Member of Congress on the Democratic side in this House, has been a dyestuff importer for years. During the war he had two factories that he operated himself with his own capital. He furnished the Army with salvarsan, a vital drug, necessary for the preservation of the health of our soldiers. He is a member of the American Dyes Institute, which has been referred to here, and which has three members on this board. He is opposed by the Alien Property Custodian, who has pursued him and claimed that he had German interests. Mr. Garvan admitted on the stand that Mr. Herman A. Metz, whom he had been pursuing, was one of the members of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), and also a member of the American Dyes Institute, which had been formed largely by Mr. Poucher, of the Du Pont Co., who had formerly been the general manager of Kuttroff, Pickhardt & Co., a large German concern in the United States. Property of Herman A. Metz was seized by the Alien Property Custodian, and he, being a native American, has brought suit to recover.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I will say further that they were so anxious to have Herman A. Metz with them in this combination to get control of the industries, along with the others that were consolidating, that they put him down for $100,000 to put the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) through, and he put up $30,000 or $50,000, I do not know which, and then they drew upon him for the balance. But they have taken his property just the same. He being an American citizen and American born, they could not send him to Ogiethorpe. He is still here, and he is fighting his case in the courts of New York. One of the attorneys who is taking his property to-day is one of the numerous attorneys who were employed by the Alien Property Custodian, our former colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. John J. Fitzgerald. If the gentleman wants a further explanation, since it is a matter of litigation and since libel suits are pending against the Alien Property Custodian and the Attorney General for acts against some American citizens owning property in the United States, it may be well for the House to understand the intricacies which surround the entire situation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think I have no love for the Chemical Foundation, as members of the Ways and Means Committee know; but what they have done and what Mr. Herman A. Metz may or may not have done has nothing to do with this bill. I say that much for the information of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

Now, what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said is correct in the main. What I said was also correct—that this same ex-Congressman had been found guilty of hiding and concealing German property; that he had been compelled to turn it over; and he paid, as I recollect, some $40,000 penalty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is in error as to that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This suit was over an alleged misrepresentation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is talking about another and different case.

But we are getting on outside matters simply, which confuses the situation instead of getting at the facts that cover the bill.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to strike out a sufficient number of words for me to make a statement and to say that it is pleasing to the membership of this body when we can get the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to disagree long enough for us to find out a few things. I hope they will disagree often in a friendly way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BACHARACH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 503 (a). During the period of two years after the date of the approval of this act it shall be unlawful for any person or persons or corporation to import or bring into the United States, or any of its possessions, except under license previously obtained from the dye-licensing commission hereinafter created, any of the products enumerated in section 500 of this act, or any product derived directly or indirectly from coal tar, including crude products and intermediate products, as well as dyestuffs, medicinals, and other finished products, and including mixtures and compounds of such products and other products.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. REAVIS). The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 9, line 7, after the word "obtained," insert "as hereinafter provided"; in the same line, after the word "the," strike out the words "dye licensing commission" and insert "United States Tariff Commission"; and in line 8 strike out the words "hereinafter created."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, do the gentlemen want to agree upon time on that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I reserve my motion to strike out. I presume this preferential motion will be acted upon first.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want some time on this amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I propose to move to strike out, and reserve all rights in that regard. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] makes the preferential motion by way of amendment. Does the debate come on his motion or mine?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, having been recognized, is entitled to the floor, but the vote comes first on the preferential motion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be taken from the floor by the offering of a preferential motion after he has once been recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let us see if we can agree upon time for debate on this amendment. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio want?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think 10 minutes will enable me to explain the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ten minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, we will let it run for the time being.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I proceed, Mr. Chairman, for 5 minutes and then reserve the balance of my time? As I understand, 10 minutes has been assigned to me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. There is no agreement. I will put it this way: Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want to speak five minutes and then speak again?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may now occupy five minutes and not lose the right to occupy further time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may now occupy five minutes without losing the right to occupy further time on his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the real fight on this bill is presented by this motion—the motion to strike out. If it prevails with section 503 (a), I shall make a similar motion with respect to all the other sections relating to the license features of the bill.

I call to the attention of my colleagues the fact that this is a very high protective tariff bill. So far as I know, except that the duties are exceptionally high in the preceding paragraphs, there is no objection to these tariff features. No Republican has offered any objection, and I am not entirely sure but that most of the Democrats are prepared to vote for these duties as set forth in the bill.

The discussion is over the addition to the protective tariff bill of what is brand new in all protective tariff legislation—a licensing commission, or a new organization which shall have power over and above that of the Treasury Department, through its customhouse officials, to check imports. It goes away beyond what most of us as Republicans ever believed to be the protective tariff doctrine. It gives a strangle hold to those in control of the commission which shall be appointed now, under an administration that is favorable to commissions, to compel those who will do business under this particular law to submit their business arrangements to this autocratic board. It goes beyond anything that any Republican platform ever expected in the way of legislation at the hands of Congress.

I call attention to the fact that everything in the nature of dyestuffs, crudes, or intermediates, or solutions, are protected in this bill in the paragraphs that we have thus far read.

If you will look at page 4, which groups a number of commodities know as dyestuffs, salts, acids, and so forth, you will find that it embraces all, whether crude, or manufactured from, or products derived from; anything obtained, derived, or produced from; everything not herein enumerated, all distillates of coal tar after a number have been specified, all mixtures, including solutions after all known commodities have been specified; all the foregoing, not colors, dyes, or stains. There is not anything that can escape the customhouse. Everything is included in this bill at the rate of 40 per cent ad valorem and above.

In Group III you find the same language with regard to intermediates; all, including all mixtures and solutions, and everything produced from them; nothing can escape the customhouse. Then, why a dye-licensing commission after all these safeguards have been set up? Why, after the war is over and the President's war powers continuing, have a Federal dye-licensing commission?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the amendment which I have offered will be to turn over the licensing provided for in this bill to the United States Tariff Commission. That amendment, if it shall prevail, will involve several other amendments that I will offer as the sections are reached.

If gentlemen will take their bills and follow I will explain just what it will involve. Section 503 (b) will go out altogether, down to and including line 4 on page 11. Then an amendment will be offered there which will provide for the expenses of the Tariff Commission for taking over this function which it does not now possess.

A very important amendment will be offered to section 503 (c), so that when amended it will read as follows:

The said United States Tariff Commission shall issue licenses to import for domestic consumption such products covered by section 503 (a) of this act as may be unobtainable from domestic sources; also such products only as may be obtainable from domestic sources which shall be unobtainable by reason of price, quality, or conditions of delivery.

At the end of the section the following amendment will be offered:

The commission, in passing upon applications for such licenses, may regulate its own practice and procedure, but it shall so regulate the same as to prevent unavoidable delay.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. If a disagreement arises as to price between the Tariff Commission and the man who seeks to import, who is to determine what is a reasonable price?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will answer the gentleman. It is probable that no disagreement ever would arise. I will answer the question specifically, however, in the course of a general explanation.

Gentlemen, the adoption of these amendments will obviate all legitimate criticism of this licensing system as proposed in this bill. In the first place there is unquestionably some doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to provide a board to be selected by certain industries interested in the general subject. There is no possible question as to the constitutionality of giving these functions to the Tariff Commission.

Secondly, there has been some question in the minds of gentlemen as to whether the provisions in the present bill would make it mandatory on the licensing commission to issue a license in every case where the dye was not obtainable in this country.

Thirdly, it obviates any question of the commission or any of its members having any financial interest in the administration of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The amendment which I shall offer absolutely compels the Tariff Commission to issue a license automatically and at once in the case of every dye sought to be imported, where that dye is not made in this country. It is a question of fact, and the Tariff Commission are probably better able to point to the fact than any other commission, because they have in their possession a census of the dye manufacturers of this country, which they have submitted to Congress in a recent report. They know every dye maker; they know every dye he makes. They have in their office all the information, so that at once, beyond any question, a license will issue to any man who desires for use in his factory a dye which is not made in this country. The only discretion left in the commission with regard to issuing licenses is where the dye is made in this country, but the applicant for the license submits that he can not procure it within a reasonable time and for a reasonable price. There the Tariff Commission will use its discretion in the matter, and it seems to me that probably it would be the rarest circumstance where any disagreement could arise.

The plain, practical fact of this whole matter is that the purpose of this provision is to prevent the importation of dyes which are made in this country. As a matter of fact, to-day, gentlemen, our manufacturers are supplying at least four-fifths of the American market. There is no question about the importation of those dyes. They are made here, and they are just as good as any dyes made anywhere else. The only question as to importation arises from the fact that there are certain dyes of a highly specialized nature, evolved during the 40 years in which Germany has controlled the world market in this business, that our chemists have not yet learned how to make. They are mostly these vat dyes. A number of them were covered by the patents which were bought by the Chemical Foundation, and that is the only way in which the Chemical Foundation can possibly appear in connection with this matter. They have licensed the use of some of these German patents to American manufacturers, and they are now experimenting along those lines. The danger would be that if we did not have this license system, dyes similar to those which are being made in this country would be dumped in here regardless of the cost; because, as I have pointed out repeatedly during the course of this debate, the Germans to-day are not concerned as to the price they get for the disposition of this enormous accumulation of dyes they have now, not only in Germany but in Switzerland and Sweden and Norway and other countries, which are available almost at once for importation. They do not care anything about the price they get for them, but what they want to do is to cut down and overthrow the American chemical industry, which will be their only serious competitor in this country, in the American market. Once having destroyed our whole industry, then they can bring in their dyes and sell them for any profit they please, because there will be no competition against them. No tariff rate, no matter how high, will prevent that, gentlemen. This is the only way to prevent the destruction of our infant chemical industry.

The proposition involves only two years. It practically involves only a year and a half, because the importation of the necessary foreign dyes for the next six months is already provided for. It is a purely temporary expedient, to prevent the dumping of this vast accumulated surplus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask for myself the same privilege that I asked for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that I may, if I desire, proceed again on this amendment, that by yielding the floor I may not be precluded from speaking on it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to speak a second time on this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, as this is a very important matter so far as the interests of my district are concerned, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman really think that if he wanted 20 minutes on this bill he ought to have asked for it in the general debate?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I certainly did, and was promised it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How did it happen that the gentleman did not get his time?

Mr. BURROUGHS. The time was used up before I was reached.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. When did the gentleman put in his request?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Before the debate was begun.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This is pretty late.

Mr. BURROUGHS. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will substantiate what I say, that I did actually make a request a day or two before the debate began.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not understand it, and I will not object, because I did not understand the situation.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, if one may judge from the course which the debate has taken so far, there are some gentlemen in the House who believe in the Republican policy of a protective tariff to protect our industries against foreign competition, but they believe in it with important qualifications. They give it credit—that is, some credit. They have faith in it, but not full faith in it. They believe in it sometimes, but not now. For instance, these gentlemen, if I can believe what they say, if I understand their proposition, believe in this Republican doctrine of a protective tariff as applied to Great Britain and France and Spain and Japan, but when it comes to applying it to Germany, oh, no; they draw the line there.

They believe in this doctrine of protective tariff as applied to coal, steel, iron, and textiles, and a thousand other things, but when it comes to dyestuffs they throw up their hands. They believe, at least they say they believe, in this doctrine of a protective tariff in two years from now; but for the space of two years they say—to use a homely expression—it is not worth a "tinker's dam."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe and really believe in the Republican protective tariff policy [applause] as sufficient, and amply sufficient, together with its antidumping provisions, to protect and safeguard all American industries at all times and against all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important speech, and I think there should be a quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that the gentleman from Kansas ought not to filibuster in that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It is no filibuster.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is very important that the House should pass this bill this afternoon, and I hope the gentleman will not filibuster.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I have said this is a very important bill, and it is very important that Members should be here and hear this speech.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is important, and it may be, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said this morning, that it is necessary to get this under the skulls of the Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We are trying to convert the Democrats, and there is still some hope for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, in common with all members of the committee, I listened with much interest to the very able speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who opened the debate a day or two ago in support of this bill. Not since I came into this House has it been my pleasure to hear a more comprehensive or enlightening statement. With much that he said I am in complete accord. With all that he said with reference to the great and even vital importance of the dye industry, both from an industrial and a national standpoint, I wholly agree. I have no quarrel either with him or any other advocate of this bill in what they have said concerning the necessity of early action by Congress to safeguard this industry against any unfair competition that may reasonably be apprehended on the part of Germany or any other nation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am wholly unable to follow the logic of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and others in the particular method by which they propose in this bill to accomplish this end. We all wish to protect and safeguard the dye industry against ruinous competition when the protection which has been afforded by the war is removed. I for one, however, decline to do this at the expense and to the great injury of other American industries at least equally as important as the dye industry. I say I decline to do this. I do decline and refuse to do it unless I can be shown that this is the only means of maintaining an industry that is absolutely essential to the national defense. I am frank to say that up to date, although I have read the hearings before the committee with much care and listened attentively to the debate, I have not been convinced that the licensing feature contained in the present bill is either desirable or necessary.

Mr. Chairman, the district that I have the honor to represent in this House is one of the large industrial districts in this country. Some of the largest and most important textile manufacturing corporations in the United States are located there. These people are all vitally interested in this proposed legislation, and they are all, as I am advised, opposed to the licensing provisions contained in this bill. They are not opposed in any sense to the dyestuffs industry. On the contrary, they want to see it suitably protected at least until such time as it shall have reached a complete development in this country. They want to see all reasonable encouragement and protection given to it so that it may furnish dyes in quality, quantity, and variety equal to those produced anywhere in the world.

But the people that I represent have had quite enough experience with war boards and commissions. They wish to get rid of them so far as possible at the earliest practicable moment. While the war was going on, in common with all good citizens, they acceded to all the red tape and all the dictatorial and arbitrary action that had been inseparably connected with these boards and commissions. But now when the war is over they feel that all such means and agencies of governmental interference with individual action in business affairs is unwise and unnecessary. Instead of creating more of them we ought to put an end to most of those that now exist and get back to normal ways of doing things as soon as we can.

The position of the textile manufacturers of my district is well expressed in the following quoted telegram which I have just received from the agent of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., Hon. H. F. Straw, of Manchester, N. H., one of the best known and best informed manufacturers of cotton and worsted fabrics in the United States:

We understand a system or bill for the licensing of dyestuffs to be imported from abroad is to be considered by the House of Representatives to-morrow morning. The textile people are in no way opposed to giving all due protection and encouragement to our dyestuff interests, but we do object strongly to a system which puts the interests of this great industry at the arbitrary discretion of any board or any commissioner. It would be impossible to conduct our business intelligently when we were at any time liable to have our plans upset at any moment, and must ask the permission of any man or men before we could buy materials absolutely necessary to the successful conduct of our business. Such restriction might possibly be justified by war-time necessity, but seems absolutely unjustifiable in a time of peace. The actual situation in the dyestuff industry seems to us to be about as follows: There are many colors to-day sorely needed for the successful dyeing of our goods, both cotton and worsted, which are produced and can be bought abroad, and which our makers perhaps can not, but certainly do not, produce now. These colors we believe we should be allowed to buy at our own discretion, as we think we are better judges of our own needs than any Government board can possibly be. We are perfectly willing that any tariff, reasonable and necessary for the protection of American makers, should be imposed on these imported dyes; beyond this we believe we should be allowed to exercise our own judgment as to the amounts needed in our own business. We believe the American makers may eventually produce these dyes, but it would certainly seem they have little or no inducement to work in this direction as long as their importation is arbitrarily restricted by license or embargo. We are speaking in the interests of both producers and users of colored textiles, as it is impossible to-day to make as satisfactory and durable colors of many kinds with American dyes as with foreign.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman realize that as to every one of the dyes mentioned in that letter, under the amendment that I said I would offer, the license will automatically issue without any discretion on the part of the commission?

Mr. BURROUGHS. I do not understand it in that way, but the gentleman's amendment has not yet been adopted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman be satisfied if it were adopted?

Mr. BURROUGHS. It is true that the dyestuffs industry practically started in this country because of the opportunity afforded by the war. Up to that time it was practically a one-nation industry. Germany was producing up to 1914 three-quarters of all the dyes consumed by the whole world. It is true, also, that under the stimulus and the protection afforded by the war this industry has now got a substantial start in this country. Something like $400,000,000 are now said to be invested in the dyestuffs industry in 16 States of the country, and in 1918, in addition to supplying the major part of our domestic needs, dyes and dyestuffs to the value of nearly $17,000,000 were exported to the United Kingdom, Canada, France, Italy, Japan, Spain, and many South American countries.

And yet many dyes that are now vitally necessary in the manufacture of high-grade textiles, as, for instance, the cotton and worsted fabrics made by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., in my district, are not now obtainable in this country. Their manufacture depends upon technical chemical processes, with which, as yet, our dye makers and chemists do not seem to be familiar. They have to be imported, and this condition will doubtless continue for some considerable length of time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has stated that there are $400,000,000 invested here in the dyestuff industry. Those figures have been disputed and held to be too high, but I would like to say to the gentleman—because I think it is important—that while it is claimed that the dyestuff manufacturers represent $400,000,000, the users of dyestuffs, by the same authority that gave the $400,000,000, represent $3,000,000,000 of business.

Mr. BURROUGHS. The gentleman is quite correct. I understand the testimony in the hearings showed that not only was there business to the extent of $3,000,000,000 directly interested as users of these dyes, but a further investment of $3,000,000,000 was indirectly interested.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The industries dependent upon the dyestuffs mount up to $3,000,000,000, while the actual dyestuff investment is $400,000,000.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURROUGHS. For a question.

Mr. EMERSON. I want to call attention that if the $3,000,000,000 industry had not been protected years ago they would not be here to-day.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Nobody is advocating anything except a suitable protective tariff to protect this industry. We all want to protect the industry, and we all realize that it is a vital industry, and we all want to protect it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to say that the bill provides the highest possible protection to dyestuff manufacturers, and the only thing we object to is that it shall not create a monopoly through this dye-licensing commission. Gentlemen who want to vote for a monopoly will vote for the dye-licensing commission.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Why, of course, as the gentleman states, the tariff rates provided in this bill are highly protective, considerably higher than were ever before provided by any tariff bill ever passed by the American Congress. I do not object to that, but I think that is going far enough.

This is said to be an "infant industry," and that is probably true. That is to say, it has not yet reached complete development, and its continuance in this country, now that the protection afforded by the war is about to be removed, will be seriously endangered unless encouragement and adequate protection in some other form is extended to it.

The tariff rates proposed by the bill would seem to afford ample and adequate protection to this industry. These rates, both ad valorem and specific, are considerably higher than those afforded by existing law, which, at the time it was passed in 1916, was understood to afford adequate protection to this industry. It is probably true that in addition to these tariff rates we ought to have a more stringent antidumping law in order to prevent Germany or any other nation from flooding our market with these dyes at a price very much lower than they are sold at home. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said in his speech on this bill on Tuesday that he was now preparing such an antidumping bill, and that he expected it would be ready for consideration by the committee in the near future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, I have not heretofore taken up much of the time of the House——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I think I can finish in 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I hope it will be granted, because I am a seeker after knowledge touching this legislation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURROUGHS. There are still other means by which this dye industry may be protected. One of them is the power in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission to prevent unfair competition. These German dyes, if they come here, will not, except in rare instances, be imported direct by the manufacturer. They will be imported in the first instance by dealers in this country, who will sell the dyes to the manufacturers as they are needed. Competition between such dealers and the American manufacturers of dyes will be, under existing law, entirely under the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission to prevent unfair practices.

Then, too, as we all know, there are important provisions in the peace treaty between this country and Germany—which I sincerely hope may soon be ratified—that ought to afford strong protection against any possible menace from unfair German competition. I refer to those provisions in the treaty giving to the reparation commission large powers of control over trade between Germany and the allied nations.

Then there are 4,500 German patents held by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), and covering, it is said, substantially every kind of dye known to the trade. It is confidently believed that licenses issued by the Chemical Foundation to manufacture dyes under these patents will also afford substantial protection against German competition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield at that point? I do not want the gentleman to have any misinformation——

Mr. BURROUGHS. I know what the gentleman has stated. And I will say that whether these patents cover all of the dyes known to the trade or not it is a fact that they do cover every dye that Germany thought it was worth while to take out a patent on in the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. To prevent our manufacturers making them.

Mr. BURROUGHS. It is a significant fact that in all the tariff hearings—mark this—for 40 years the representatives of the dye industry in this country have never asked for anything in the way of protection other than that afforded by the tariff. They have always said that if they could have the rates which they suggested this would be sufficient. If the tariff was deemed sufficient to protect this industry before the war, what has happened in the meantime to make it less effective? Certainly, as I have already shown, the dye industry in this country, although it may not be said to be yet firmly established here, is in a much stronger position than it was before the war. Can it be said that Germany, beaten and prostrated as she is, with a depreciated currency, a great labor unrest throughout the country, and with a reparation commission practically controlling her trade with the world until she shall have paid her war debts, is in a stronger position to compete now than she was before the war? I think not. If adequate protective tariff rates were deemed sufficient, as in fact they were always deemed sufficient, before the war, I must be shown why they are not sufficient to afford all necessary protection to this dye industry at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, I have complete faith in tariff as a means to protect and to upbuild infant industries like this. It has been found sufficient heretofore. Those who did not believe in a protective tariff said that we could not build up in this country a steel industry, and yet we all know that America now leads the world in the production of steel. More recently the opponents of protection argued against it in connection with tin plate. They told us that there was something in the atmosphere in Wales that made this industry natural to that country, and that no protective tariff could build it up here, and yet the fact is, Mr. Chairman, as we all know, that to-day America makes three-quarters of all the tin plate in the world. [Applause.] I see no reason in the world why an adequate tariff such as is provided in this bill, together with an antidumping law, such as the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is about to introduce, taken in connection with the other safeguards to which I have alluded, will not afford to this industry everything in the way of protection that is desirable or necessary in order that it shall reach a complete development in this country.

Now, what is going to be the effect if this licensing system is established? It is going to make every manufacturer or user of dyes come to Washington and appear before this board and prove to the satisfaction of the board either (1) that such dyes as he desires are not obtainable in this country or (2) that such dyes are not obtainable in this country on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery. To be sure, the bill provides that the commission "shall issue licenses to import for use in domestic manufacture," and so forth, from which it is argued that it is substantially mandatory upon the board to issue a license upon application. I do not so understand it. This language of the bill, to my mind, clearly grants to the commission full discretion either to issue or to withhold the license. I mean by that that the commission is the sole and final judge as to whether a certain dye is obtainable in this country. It is also the final judge as to whether, if obtainable at all, it may be obtained on "reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery." What are "reasonable terms"? No standard appears to be fixed by the bill. All is left to the commission. It is for them to say what is reasonable and what is not reasonable. For example, is the holder of one of these 4,500 German patents to which I have referred going to be allowed to charge the royalty that he will have to pay to the Chemical Foundation on this patent in fixing a price on the dye he makes and offers for sale? Is that going to be a part of the "reasonable terms"?

The point I wish to make is that arbitrary power is thus placed in the hands of this licensing board—power to grant or to withhold a license upon findings of fact to be made by the board, from which there is no appeal. Such power may have been necessary in time of war. It is confidently believed that it is not at all necessary and it is certainly not desirable when we are trying to get back to normal peace conditions. The great objection to the licensing system is the inevitable delay and consequent damage that will be caused to the American dye-consuming interests in getting the things they want when they need them. The user of the dye is not ordinarily the licensee. The quantity which he requires of particular dyes and his knowledge of his needs are not such as to enable him to import them long enough in advance, and the user in the ordinary case, with the exception of a few large corporations, must rely upon some dealer who will import the dyes and carry them in stock ready for use as he needs them. It is entirely impossible for the dealer to know what the calls are going to be upon him for any considerable period in advance, because he can not ascertain from his customers. They will not know themselves. These questions are determined by fashion. As bearing out this contention, I take leave to quote from the testimony at the hearings given by Mr. John P. Wood, president of the Pequea Mills, Philadelphia, Pa., and for many years president of the National Woolen Association. Mr. Wood was one of the important witnesses before the committee. He said:

I begin to offer a line of goods to my customers for the next spring at this time in the year (July), and certain styles are brown and certain are blue and certain are gray. My customers can not tell until they begin to get results from their sales which colors are going to predominate. In some years they will be what are known as brown seasons, when brown will predominate; and another time it may be blue, and, exceptionally, it may be an unusual color, like a green tone. I must wait until that need is developed before I can order the dyestuffs which I require. Then, when the need is developed, I must have the dyestuffs at once. I can not wait until they are imported. If I go then to the dealer and he says this particular color which you have asked for I can not supply because I was unable to get a license, and I have impressed him with my need, and that there is nothing else that I can get in this country, and he says come before the license board with me and tell your case. So we come down here and meet the licensing board—I presume it will not be in constant session; these gentlemen, all but one of them, are serving without pay; they have busy interests of their own; they live in different parts of the country, and there must be times for them to get together and consider these questions. So, probably an appointment is made for me a week or two weeks or three weeks hence to present my case. * * * We will suppose the board is in session constantly. Most of us know from experience in Washington during the last two years how very difficult it is to get a question upon which a decision is needed passed upon by any of these various boards. They are busy, with a great deal of business coming before them, and they can not take up every man's application as soon as it becomes urgent to him. However that may be, it will be necessary for me to come down here and prove my case, and I will have to show that I have tried to get American colors for this particular necessity, and have been unable to do so, and they ask me what the requirements are, and I tell them of all the different things that occur to me, fastness to light, fastness to scouring, fastness to fulling, and so forth, and then they tell me there has lately been brought out a new American color, which they think will answer these needs, and they show me various samples. My only answer is that I have not had that submitted to me yet, but I am perfectly willing to try it; and I go home and send for a product sample and begin to experiment, but these experiments necessarily involve time. I can not tell whether a blue for a blue serge suit is fast to the sun until it is exposed to the sun; I have to expose it for days to determine that, so with the various other characteristics. I finally discover that in some one of these particulars it fails. It may bleed on white; it has not the same color under artificial light, or for some reason or other it does not meet my case. I have got to come before the licensing board again and show my difficulty. Perhaps then they may give me a license. Meanwhile on the contracts which I had made I am in default; machinery that I have and my employees are probably waiting for work. After I have finally obtained the license, which had not been given to the dealer previously, he has then to get the product from where it originates. Even though he cables for it, it is a matter of three or four weeks before it can be brought here.

Under such conditions, I believe it is not unfair or unreasonable to conclude that the inevitable effect of such a system would be to hamper and hamstring and, in many instances, actually prevent the manufacture of certain grades of textiles in this country. Such fabrics would be imported, to the great injury and loss of the American textile industry. It has taken years of persistent effort and painstaking skill to develop the domestic manufacture of textiles so that the better qualities would be accepted by the public as in all respects equal to the best of similar imported fabrics. For some years preceding the war this position had been attained by the products of many American mills. But if manufacturers here are going to be unable to procure the necessary dyes of the same excellence as those available to their foreign competitors, the public will soon begin to realize through personal experience an inferiority in the color of domestic goods, and there will inevitably be revived the old prejudice in favor of imported goods, and that prejudice will persist for years after the cause for complaint has been eliminated.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor—I believe we are all on this side of the House at least in favor—of affording adequate protection to this vitally important dye industry. I am wholly opposed to the method suggested for affording that protection through a licensing system, because of the delays, inconveniences, and loss that it will necessarily entail to other equally important American industries, and for the further reason that it is wholly unnecessary. I oppose it because of its arbitrary powers. It would not and could not be uniform in its application. It would inevitably favor some to the injury of others. The tariff, on the other hand, is absolutely uniform. It applies to all alike. It plays no favorites. It is the method heretofore employed and which in all similar circumstances has been found effective. No good reason is perceived why we should now engraft upon it this new and dangerous undemocratic, unrepublican, and un-American licensing policy. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am only going to take up the time of the committee for just a moment. I have always been a believer in the American policy of protection, because I have believed in building up American industries. The free-trade theory, if we had had it in practice as part of our policy throughout our history, would have resulted in this country being an agricultural country pure and simple. It is because of the policy of protection that we have to-day a vast and varied manufacturing industry, built up by the wise and beneficent policy of encouraging home industry by tariff legislation. Now, Mr. Chairman, as has been said by the preceding speaker, the true policy of protection is uniform and impartial. It protects all American capital and all American labor—the small producer as well as the large manufacturer. It has been the policy of the Nation and not of individuals, and I have always resented the charge, so frequently brought against the American protective policy, that it was a policy of special privileges.

I have been surprised that any committee of this House would bring in a bill with a clause in it such as this licensing clause. No protectionist heretofore, however extreme, has ever gone to the length of saying to the American people that, in addition to a protective tariff for the purpose of raising revenue and at the same time giving incidental protection, "you must buy the American product, even if it is inferior in quality, although you may be willing to pay two or three times as much for a foreign product of superior quality." That is precisely what this licensing clause does. It puts in the hands of a licensing commission here in Washington the right to say to the American consumer of dyes, "You can not buy the foreign product, even if you are willing to pay a very large duty, unless we give you a license, and we are going to compel you to purchase the domestic article that in our opinion is 'just as good' in quality," although the American consumer of experience knows that it is not of as good a quality.

One of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means told me since this bill has been under discussion that his wife bought some American goods to make a dress for his little girl and that the domestic dye, which had not yet been perfected in this country, had run and the dress was spoiled after the first wearing. I submit, Mr. Chairman, the American people will not stand for any such legislation. They will not stand to be told they have got to buy the domestic article regardless of its quality.

The object of a high duty is to encourage the production of American goods of as good quality as the foreign article. If you have such a license provision as this there is no incentive to the American producer to improve the process, because he knows that a license will be refused for the importation of the foreign article. With the protective tariff, Mr. Chairman, I believe in the spur of foreign competition. I believe in a tariff that protects American labor and capital, but I believe that there should be a possibility of importing the foreign article that may be superior in quality. If an American citizen desires to pay the increased price for the foreign article which he believes superior in quality and necessary for his business, he should be allowed to buy it if he is willing to pay the duty which this Congress puts on the article. [Applause.]

With this license clause you are practically doing away with the benefits of protection. You are putting a Chinese wall up, and you are saying to the American producer, "You need not care about the quality of your goods, because the American people are bound to buy them regardless of their cost."

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of a duty high enough to protect American labor and capital, and I believe that with the spur of foreign competition our industries will eventually be able to produce goods of as good quality as any in the world, but I am opposed to the licensing feature of this bill, and I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have always been a firm supporter of the protective doctrine, but I can support this bill without abating one jot or tittle of my protective principles. The gentleman who spoke a moment ago, Mr. BURROUGHS, who made a very able speech in opposition to the bill, said that those who favored the license plan contained in this bill considered the protection principle as sufficient as against England and against France and as against any other country except Germany. Right the gentleman was. It is sufficient against any country that will conduct its business on honest and honorable standards. It is not sufficient as against a country that continually employs the machinations that Germany has used to destroy the business of this country.

If anyone wants to understand what Germany has been doing let him read the report of the Alien Property Custodian. Let him understand that arrangements have been made, with the approval of the German Government, that German goods should be sold here at any price that would drive out the American manufacturer, no matter what it was, and the Government would make up the difference. In the same manner as during the war Germany filled our land with spies with design to destroy our factories by means of dynamite or fire, it has also filled our land at all times with its agents seeking to destroy our business, our manufactories, by means of secret and devious methods. As I stated yesterday in discussing this bill, while this war was going on Mr. Hugo Sweitzer, an agent of the German Government, in examining into this matter with reference to dyes, wrote to Count von Bernstorff that it would be merely "child's play"—I use the exact words he used in his letter—that it would be merely "child's pay" to drive out the American manufacturer under the protective system that was established by the Hill bill, which carried nearly as high rates as this bill.

Now, gentlemen have said that an antidumping provision would be sufficient to keep the German manufacturers from overwhelming our business in this country. Ordinarily that would be true, but in the case of dyes manufactured by a secret process who can tell what is the cost? What method is there of applying the antidumping provision, which is based upon the cost of the article which is imported? The only method by which we can be sure to control the situation is by some sort of a license system such as this bill provides.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has offered, instead of the license commission which is provided for in this bill, another provision, making the Tariff Board the license commission. I am quite in accord with his amendment, because I have preferred the Tariff Board all the time. The provision which is carried in the bill was put there because so many gentlemen objected that the consumers of the dyes would not have sufficient to say about the matter if any governmental board was in control. So in order to protect them we framed a provision in which the consumers of dyes, the manufacturers of cloth, should be in the majority. As it seems now, it was still not satisfactory to many of them. I therefore favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, putting the Tariff Commission in their place.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have had in my own mind three very specific objections to the licensing provision in the bill, and one was the constitutionality of the item as written. The Tariff Board would remove that objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There would be no question about it.

Mr. FESS. The other was that there might be an advantage taken that would prove a selfish advantage to those who were issuing the license. That would be removed by the Tariff Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, the third objection that I have had is fundamental; that is, that the license system is a wrong method of legislation, and the Tariff Board amendment has not removed that objection from my mind yet. Does not the gentleman think that in the promise that we have made that we will take the shackles off of business, it is a bad step to add more to it when the war is over? That is what troubles me more than anything else.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will take up, briefly, the matters which the gentleman has mentioned. He first spoke of the constitutionality of the provision in the bill with reference to the appointment of the commission. I wish only to say a word or two with reference to that, because it is likely to go out in any event. I want to say that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was entirely incorrect in imagining that the members of the committee had given no thought to the constitutionality of this provision. There has been a great diversity of opinion as to what constitutes an officer of the United States. For example, the Members of the House who sit here may think they are officers under the Constitution of the United States, but they are not, and the Supreme Court has so decided. Not all—and I might say only a small portion—who act for the United States in various capacities are officers of the United States. In the case of the United States against Germaine, reported in the Ninety-ninth United States Reports, which I have before me but from which I shall not take the time to read, the Supreme Court laid down several particulars which were necessary to constitute an officer of the United States. One was that he should receive a salary from the United States; another, that he should take an oath of office; another, that his duties should be continuous and not intermittent.

Gentlemen will observe that none of those matters apply to the commission which is created under this bill. Instead of being officers, the members of this commission would be merely agents of the Treasury Department. For that reason the Ways and Means Committee considered this constitutional objection was not valid. Some of us admitted there might be some doubt of it, and for that reason, as the gentleman from Ohio says, I prefer the substitution of the Tariff Board.

Now, coming to the last and more fundamental objection that the gentleman from Ohio mentioned, which I regard myself as serious and important, and upon which I realize very fully there are two sides to the question, and that it admits of argument and discussion, the question is whether this board will so interfere with the business of the textile manufacturers that on the whole it might be regarded as a hindrance rather than a help to industry in the United States. I do not think it will, and I will give my reasons.

The gentleman has had some experience, and all the Members of the House have, with the various boards that have been created in war time. The arbitrary methods of these boards have caused a very strong prejudice against any matter being submitted to a board or commission, and with very good reason, because these boards have been autocrats to themselves, governed by no rule, controlled by no law, except the law which created them, and by the President, who was above them. Consequently their acts were at times arbitrary in the extreme. But this commission will not be such. It is controlled by law, and I undertook, in connection with the other members of the committee, to so hedge about their authority, to so define it and particularize it, that there could be no danger of their acting arbitrarily. And the gentleman from Massachusetts said a short time ago that under this bill a man might be obliged to buy American dyes even though they were inferior goods. Not at all. The case is just the contrary. The provisions of the bill before we get through with it, if they are not already, will be explicit in that respect. Moreover, this bill only lasts for two years. It is simply to get the dyestuff industry fairly on its feet under competition with Germany, and we hope to be able to do that in two years.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman a question? Will it be possible to amend this bill so as to place in the hands of the user the authority to be the judge of the quality that he must have and not submit that question to some tribunal to determine for him? Have I made it plain? It is to give to the user of the dyestuff the authority to judge of the quality and whether or not the dyestuff made here is of sufficient quality to suit him.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I do not think an amendment of that kind could be added. I do not think that could be done if the license system is preserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This license system, if it should be adopted at all, as evidenced from the situation which we have before us, will be placed in the hands of the Tariff Commission. So far, through all our experience with the Tariff Commission, we have never had any trouble with the decisions of that commission on questions of fact, whether the members of the commission were appointed by a Republican President or by a Democratic President. So far as their decisions upon questions of fact are concerned, they have always been accepted. All that they have to do under this bill will be to pass upon the facts of the case, and then the facts having been determined, it follows as a matter of course that the license will either be granted or not granted. Under those circumstances I feel that I should support the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the principal issue between gentlemen of the House is represented by the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to strike out the section. I do not, however, intend to discuss that particular feature of the bill—that is, the license feature. Before we reach the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the vote will come on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to substitute the Tariff Commission for the commission provided by this bill, and it is to that motion that I wish to address myself.

I stated yesterday in a request to extend my remarks for the purpose of printing some amendments that I was confident that the method of designating the commission provided in the bill was without constitutional warrant, and the amendments which I proposed were intended, without in any way affecting the general policy of the bill, to provide for a constitutional method of designating the commission and exercising the functions imposed upon it. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio disposes of the constitutional objections which I had in mind; but I wish to advert to them very briefly, because whatever may be done with this section finally, it is clear that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio ought to be adopted.

The pending bill provides for a dye licensing commission, composed of 11 members, 10 of whom are selected by 10 different commercial organizations, none of which has any official status whatever. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

> The President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

That provision clearly contemplates that persons exercising official functions under the Constitution or the laws of the United States shall be appointed by the President, either alone or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the judiciary, or by the head of a department created by Congress. I want to read in connection with what I am saying an opinion in the case of United States against Germaine, in Ninety-ninth United States Reports, beginning on page 509. In this case the question of who is an officer of the United States is raised, and in discussing that question the court said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. In that case the court said:

> The argument is that provision is here made for the appointment of all officers of the United States, and that defendant, not being appointed in either of the modes here mentioned, is not an officer, though he may be an agent or employee working for the Government and paid by it, as nine-tenths of the persons rendering service to the Government undoubtedly are, without thereby becoming its officers.
> The Constitution, for purposes of appointment, very clearly divides all its officers into two classes. The primary class requires a nomination by the President and confirmation by the Senate. But foreseeing that when offices became numerous and sudden removals necessary, this mode might be inconvenient, it was provided that, in regard to officers inferior to those specially mentioned, Congress might by law vest their appointment in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. That all persons who can be said to hold an office under the Government about to be established under the Constitution were intended to be included within one or the other of these modes of appointment there can be but little doubt.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that statement, while it does not have the effect of deciding the question—because the question raised here was not specifically raised in this case—clearly indicates the construction to be placed upon the provision of the Constitution which I have just read, and that is that all officers—and officers are those exercising official functions under the Government—must be appointed in one or the other of the methods provided by the Constitution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman, of course, is aware that the particular party acting for the Government in that case was held not to be an officer?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is true. He was not held to be an officer, but he was held to be an agent or employee of the Government. The statement which the gentleman makes has nothing to do with the effect of this decision, however, because the court clearly says that those who exercise official functions—and certainly the exclusion of articles of import from the United States is an official function—must be appointed in one or the other of the methods stated in the Constitution.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio obviates the question of the constitutionality of the method proposed by substituting the Tariff Commission for the commission now proposed in the bill. That commission is appointed by the President. Entirely aside from the constitutional question involved, the Tariff Commission is clearly the body which ought to exercise the functions prescribed in this bill, if anybody is to exercise them. It has already accumulated the material necessary to determine the main questions that will arise in the execution of the licensing provisions of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am for a protective tariff, first, last, and all the time. I do not believe, from experience with the license system, that it is in line with a protective tariff. I remember that only just about a year ago the Secretary of the Interior invited the chrome users of this country to his office. He also invited the members of the Mines and Mining Committee. I was present. Before that time a law had been passed providing that the President could license the importation of chrome and certain other minerals. The President put it into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to enforce, and after a long trial he called this meeting to see where we were at on chrome. That was the way he put it. The Secretary made a speech to those present. He talked for about an hour. He said plainly that he belonged to a political party that did not believe in protection; that they had come to the point where the conditions in this country required brotherhood-of-man operations; that one strong operator must not take advantage of a weaker operator, and along that line. Then he said, "Now, how have we been operating under this license system? What has been the result?" He began asking the different users. One said, "We went into the business of trying to produce chrome out in California. We found it increased the price a great deal, and then found it was not satisfactory; we abandoned that. Then we went up into Canada and bought mines there. We produced it there and brought it down here to our works. But we found that when we got it down here chrome was being sold, all that the users wanted, at a price just half of what we could produce it for. We spent $125,000 trying to do that. We are out that much."

Another said, "We get all the chrome we want. We get it from the same parties from whom we got it before the war." "How do you get it?" "Well, we simply get it." Then the Secretary said to a large number of employees and the heads of the Shipping Board and the War Material Board who were present, "How is this? Did not the license plan operate? Did it not function?" They said, "Yes; but ore is being brought in." He asked how it was being brought in. Well, it was brought out and stated there that the ships coming from New Zealand and Australia, where chrome ore could be had, were loaded with sheepskins and wool, light loads, and they needed some kind of ballast. They said if they put sand in it cost $4 a ton to shovel it into the vessel and take it out again. It brought the Government nothing. The Government paid the $4; but if they brought the chrome ore over the Government got $35 a ton from it. Therefore they thought they would let them bring it in, and they did that, and absolutely did not comply with the licensing feature at all, and the net result was more imports of chrome ore than ever before.

The Tariff Commission, into whose hands it is proposed to put this, is a Democratic commission. Its members do not believe in a protective tariff. They can do the same thing.

This licensing system grew up in wartime. The license system was brought in by Democrats who did not believe in a protective-tariff measure. It was brought up for the purpose of developing resources that were needed during the war that had not been developed before. They put in this licensing system as a plan to go by during the war. Now, we are putting it into a bill here that is going to defeat the very purposes of a protective tariff. I am opposed to it, because of the actual experience I have had in seeing it try to operate under this administration. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to ask to limit debate on these two amendments, but I have so many requests for time that I will let it run on.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am sure every Member on the Republican side will support the tariff provisions of this bill, and I very much hope that there are a considerable number of gentlemen on the other side who will do the same. I think that whatever our views may be with regard to the protective tariff system, as a whole, the American people are pretty generally in agreement on the proposition that so far as it is practical to do so we should be industrially independent in America. We should, at least, be independent of the balance of the world with regard to industries and industrial products that are vital to the life and welfare of the Nation. I think during the course of these years of World War we have all of us realized the importance of placing the Nation in a position which will render it independent of the outside world for its vital needs and necessities in time of war. I think that no development of the war has burned itself into the consciences and souls of the American people more than that of the absolute necessity of being armed with those essential products that the Nation must have for its protection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman apply that same doctrine to imports of wool?

Mr. MONDELL. Most assuredly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I happen to have here a statement from the New York Sun of this morning that Australian wool is coming into Boston, and that many thousand bales are displayed in the auction market there. That wool is coming from Australia under British auspices. It is raw material imported into the United States which we need here for the purpose of manufacturing garments, to make clothing for our people. The gentleman is in favor of a tariff on wool, is he not?

Mr. MONDELL. Most certainly; a reasonable tariff.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman be in favor of a commission appointed by the present administration to say what wool should come into the United States and what wool our manufacturers of wool should receive in this country?

Mr. MONDELL. Most certainly, if there was a condition warranting it, as there is in the case before us.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, then, is in favor of a commission to be appointed by President Wilson or by this administration, in addition to the protection he puts on wool by legislation?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not said anything of the kind. I do not think anything of the kind necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to say that he was in favor of a commission of that kind.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not said anything of the kind, and it is not a question whether President Wilson or somebody else appoints. It is a question of the necessity and the need of the hour.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The need of the hour is that American manufacturers get the materials they need in their business.

Mr. MONDELL. As an American I would meet the need of the hour, not from the viewpoint of any particular class of individuals, however worthy they may be, but from the viewpoint of the best interests of all the American people. Their best interests, in my opinion, will be best served by building up American industries. [Applause.] That is my viewpoint.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. Possibly the gentleman from Pennsylvania will concur with me when I have developed what I have to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to follow my leader, and will wait to see if he and I agree. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. One of the most wonderful things in the world of science is the wide use of coal-tar products. America, the greatest coal-producing country in the world, producing more coal than all the balance of the world——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. At the outbreak of the war we were absolutely dependent on foreign nations for a multitude of the products of coal tar, essential and necessary products. I think America has determined that that situation shall not again confront us, that we shall be relieved from that condition of affairs or the danger or the fear of it.

We have unlimited quantities of the material from which coal-tar products are made. We have unlimited opportunities for the development of science and industry for the production of the numberless products of coal tar. The American people are determined that we shall develop this industry, and we are proposing to lay the base and foundation for it in this bill by a protective tariff. Whether the rates are high enough or not, I do not know; I am following the committee in that regard. But it is the opinion of the majority of the committee that a very peculiar and unusual situation confronts us with regard to these industries. I am quite sure that there is no one on the Republican side, and I think very few on the Democratic side, who would be willing to admit that we propose or desire to adopt, or that it would be wise to adopt, as a part of our permanent national system a system of the licensing of imports. It has been necessary to do that to a certain extent during the war. It has been a necessary evil, increasing the handicaps that have surrounded industries under war conditions. We desire to be free from such handicaps as far as it is possible to be, and ordinarily we may be entirely free from them in a time of peace.

But gentlemen who are well informed, gentlemen who have carefully studied the situation, are of opinion that, with regard to the dye industry, when trade shall be reestablished with certain foreign countries a reasonable tariff rate will not protect the industries that have been built up in our country during the war, and to meet that situation they have proposed a temporary license system.

I am of the opinion that these gentlemen are sound in their conclusions, they have given the matter very careful thought and attention. I have not been happy at any time with the commission that was proposed in this bill, and I am very greatly pleased that the gentleman from Ohio has finally concluded to offer the amendment that he has. I think it is logical and reasonable that whatever licensing there is to be should be by the Tariff Board. I am convinced that it is essential that for a brief period, possibly as long as two years, the commission should be empowered to handle the situation through a licensing system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. No one is proposing this as a permanent American policy. It is proposed and suggested because it is necessary to meet the situation. What benefit will it be to have tariff rates as high as those carried in this bill, or higher after the industries that are just getting under way have been put out of business by the dumping of vast quantities of foreign goods upon this market. There is a situation which must be met in the immediate future. We must guard the gates until these industries just starting can get on their feet and in position to sustain themselves.

Now, there are certain folks connected with protected industries who have been beneficiaries of the protective system, who do not agree to this temporary provision because, forsooth, they say it will temporarily annoy some of their industries. It may make it a little more difficult for some of these industries to temporarily profit by the dumping of vast quantities of cheap foreign goods on this market. I have little patience with that sort of attitude. Of course, it costs somebody a little something to establish great industries. It temporarily cost the people of our country something to establish the great tin-plate industry, but it helped all in the long run.

But eventually we were all the beneficiaries and we are now simply asking that the industries that have been established during the war, that in the course of time will be able to supply our market, and eventually reduce the cost of those products, shall be protected and for a time assisted under a license system until they can get on their feet and under way. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of West Virginia and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire recognition?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desired to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question, but I find he has no time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, again I am going to make a request for a limitation of debate on this amendment. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio wish?

Mr. EMERSON. I would like to have two minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like about seven minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, it seems everybody wants time on this amendment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has been trying to get in all day, and I would not under any circumstances try to limit him or anybody else, but we are spending a whole lot of time on this particular amendment, whether or not we substitute the Tariff Board for the commission provided for in this bill. Now, we are discussing everything on earth under this amendment. I want to get along and get this bill out of the way, and we ought to confine further debate to the particular item or subject in the paragraph of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I might suggest that when the gentleman from Michigan makes his 10-minute talk the gentleman from Illinois will be sufficiently enlightened so that he will not want any time.

Mr. CANNON. I want to hear the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think I can enlighten the gentleman if he will come over to my desk and I can talk to him about two minutes, and it will not only save my own time but the gentleman's also.

Mr. FORDNEY. I shall withdraw the request for the present.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the telegram I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, September 24, 1919.

Hon. STUART F. REED, Washington, D. C.:

As one of your constituents, located at Clarksburg, we earnestly urge passage Longworth bill to preserve dye industry of United States, to prevent this industry again reverting to Germany. Adequate protection and license system as provided by Longworth bill we consider absolutely essential.

GRASSELLI CHEMICAL CO.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the name of the company which sent that telegram?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The Grasselli Chemical Co.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where is it located?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. At Clarksburg, W. Va.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With headquarters in Cincinnati?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I understand it has branches in other parts of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it an independent company, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. My information is that its chemical activities are largely to take care of its by-products.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether they own any of the German patents?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman, but I think I can say to him that it is the owner of some of the German patents.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Well, I want to say that it established in Clarksburg, W. Va., one of the splendid industries of America which has for several years been giving employment to hundreds of laborers at good wages. It has been a great benefit to the city and community. And should it be true that it has acquired German patents, it is to be commended for taking away from Germany both the patents and the industries and transferring them to America, where they will benefit American labor and pay taxes to support American institutions. And that very thing has happened.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, because I believe in the policy of protection to American industries. Knowing the history of my country and knowing what that policy has done for its progress and development, I am willing to accept the "licensing section," which is designed to still further strengthen its protective features. We have been told during the progress of this debate that the regulation of imports of chemicals and dyestuffs by a commission is un-Republican doctrine; that in connection with the so-called Chemical Foundation corporation such a commission can be used to hamper and even destroy other industries.

I am willing to accept the statement of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who assures us that the Chemical Foundation will be administered, not for profit, by men who, under the provisions of the charter, are to receive no salary and will not get a penny out of any lease of the patents taken from Germany.

We are further assured that all manufacturers in our country who desire to avail themselves of the German patents, can get them on very reasonable terms.

My colleague from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has given his solemn word to this House that the Chemical Foundation will not become a profiteering or selfish agency in administering this important trust.

Argument has been adduced with much emphasis to-day to establish the fact that this bill will create an American monopoly of the dye industry. It is conceded that Germany has had such a monopoly for a long time and, while I do not admit that this bill tends toward such a result, if it did, I would prefer an American monopoly, financed by American capital, functioning by the employment of American labor, and paying taxes to support American institutions, than to have our people and our textile industries at the mercy of a German monopoly across the seas.

If we get these industries here in our own country, Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasing thought to me that when our people buy $10,000,000 worth of dyestuffs, we still have the dye products and the money here at home and the greater part of the $10,000,000 in the pockets of American laborers. [Applause.]

Fears have been expressed that a dye monopoly in America would interfere with or perhaps destroy the textile industries. Now, that is not a terrible presumption. I take it if the dye industries are to prosper in this country they must have the looms thundering and the spindles whirling because there is their market. The American people, in their homes do not use any great amount of chemicals or dyes. Who believes that the American dye manufacturers will conspire to destroy their own market, the American market, the best market to which they have access in all the world? It would be business suicide for them to put the American weavers and spinners out of business or create a condition that would bring foreign goods or textiles to our shores. Very good reasoning has been put forward to show that the licensing system seems to be necessary at this time in addition to a high protective tariff because we are dealing with Germany.

In America and in most of the civilized countries with which we have dealings the Government goes no further than to create by law favorable conditions for business men and manufacturers, and after that both men and industries must work out their own salvation. If they lose money, the Government takes no account of them; if they make money, well and good. But let us not forget that Germany has had a monopoly of this business and will fight to the last to retain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If it were needed in order to destroy an American dye industry, the German business man would have back of him the potency and power of the German Government and likewise the German treasury. We have never gone that far in peace times in this country. The American business man, as I have stated, has always had to work out his own salvation, and he deserves every legitimate protection his country can give him.

A short time ago a returned soldier came to my office. He wore his uniform and was a splendid type of young manhood. He walked in and said, "I presume you do not remember me, but I heard you speak at the graduating exercises of the Glenville State Normal School in your district when I was a member of the graduating class, three years ago." Grasping his hand, I said, "My boy, where have you been? Have you been at the battle front?" "Yes," he said. And then he told me of his experiences, of shell shock in one battle, of a hole torn in his side in another battle, of his suffering for hours before he was found and sent to the hospital for treatment. Each time he recovered and returned to the front, and in one of the last engagements a German shell tore away a large portion of the fleshy part of his leg. He finally was brought home and to the Walter Reed Hospital, and came from there to my office. I asked him how he was feeling now. He said, "Pretty good. I have some scars, but I have a pretty good leg left." I said, "Young man, the Government owes you a debt of gratitude. What can I do for you? There are several positions vacant around Washington here, and I will try to get you a position in some of the Government departments, and shall be very glad to look after your compensation. You ought to have a liberal pension." The young man shook his head and said, "No swivel-chair job for me. I am not caring anything about compensation or pension, Mr. REED. I am glad that I helped to carry the old flag to victory and that I am back in my own country in pretty good health after all the experiences I had at the front. I am proud that I defended my country against a foreign foe, but I do not want the Government to do anything for me." Turning again to me, he said further, "Mr. REED, I would be glad to have you recommend me to some of the great industrial concerns of my country, where I can enter and grow up in the business and make a living for my wife and child; that is all I want."

What a grand American spirit that was! [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, if that spirit actuates three-fourths of our returned American soldiers to-day, the institutions of our country are safe. It is for our American institutions that I plead to-day. Let us amply protect the industries wherein our brave soldier boys may find employment and opportunity to develop that wonderful initiative that makes the American artisan the most heroic figure in the industrial world.

Now, my friends, I am glad of another thing. We are all trying to figure out what this World War has brought to civilization and mankind. We hear it said that out of the strife and suffering will come a new-born world. We pray that such may be the outcome. Our good President is sweeping across the continent telling what beneficent things may be evolved from the World War. But, as I was saying, I am truly glad of one thing, while I regret that it took a crisis of civilization to make it possible. My Democratic friends on the other side of the aisle have at last been brought to see the wisdom of the Republican policy of protection. Several of the leaders on that side have recently advocated the tariff rates of the Payne-Aldrich Act, which was once so odious to them. Yes, indeed, it is refreshing to be able to look up from the pitiful wreckage that litters a war-wasted world and see the new light shining upon the free-trade paths which they have so long followed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask unanimous consent, and if I do not get consent, I am going to move that all debate on these amendments close in 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendments close in 45 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, many of the Members of this House have listened very patiently for two days to a multitude of words upon this subject, yet but two or three very clear statements have been made. I think everyone is convinced that there is need of protection for the dye industry. There is a difference of opinion as to how that can be secured. Most of us on the Republican side have believed that the protective principle is effective if it is made high enough. [Applause on the Republican side.] The other side of this contention demands a license system on the ground that, no matter how high the protective tariff is that might be placed on it, Germany would dump large and already-manufactured amounts of dyestuffs upon the American market. If I were convinced that that were true, I would have no hesitancy in supporting the licensing feature. But the licensing feature is vicious in principle. No man has undertaken to defend it as a principle here in any of this discussion, and every man has been saying that it is a temporary makeshift. I am afraid that gentlemen are taking counsel of their apprehension rather than of their knowledge. Not one word, except opinion; no statistics; no facts; nothing upon which a man can base a conclusion resulting from a basic fundamental argument has been put forward in the two days of debate.

If there was a first, a second, a third, and a conclusion, so that men could say, "I am basing my action upon knowledge," I think there would be no difficulty at all in composing this subject immediately and directly. I confess, gentlemen, that I have listened very patiently to the discussion here. When I asked for time in the beginning I was assured that the discussion would be ended the first day, and I was exhorted not to consume any time. And yet it has gone on and on and on, and how many men in the House to-day know definitely anything about the threatened inundation from the Germans by virtue of vast stores that are already prepared? I am not willing to admit, gentlemen, that there could be no tariff high enough adequately to protect any industry in this country. [Applause.] Until I am convinced of that, until men can show on the floor, beyond merely expressing an opinion, some basic fact that underlies the contention, I shall have to vote against the licensing feature. I think there are many men upon the floor that have earnestly and honestly desired to know what the real situation is. It may be that men will say to us, "We have looked into it; we are convinced that this threatened inundation will be sure to follow." But, gentlemen, is it not about time to come before Congress and present an argument that will appeal from all the facts put forth, so that men will not have to act simply upon your judgment and opinion in the matter? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say to my good friend from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD] that when we Republicans write a protective tariff on tungsten we consult the producers of tungsten, and when we write a bill on wool we consult the producers of wool. If I understand it aright, I am consulting those in the dye industry and this is what one of them says; and what he says places this whole proposition in a few very nifty words:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, September 25, 1919.

Hon. HENRY I. EMERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We urge your active support of House bill 8078, relating to protection or dyestuff industry, and in particular to the feature providing for licensing of imports. The establishing and perfecting of manufacturing processes for the more difficult colors the manufacture of which has just started here requires such a length of time, and necessarily therefore such high initial costs that no tariff alone will furnish such protection as to guarantee a complete dyestuff industry in this country. The control of importations by license is therefore of paramount importance. We are producing at our Cleveland works coal-tar products which will be vitally affected by this bill.

THE BARRETT CO.

Now, gentlemen, I am willing, if we want to establish in this country the dye industry, to consult the people who have got to do the manufacturing and producing in this industry. Generally I am opposed to such commissions as that, but in this instance I am in favor of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, for two days I have listened attentively to this discussion. When it began I was very strongly opposed to the idea of a licensing commission composed as it was set out in the bill. It seemed to me that the licensing commission might give licenses to whom it liked, to import German dyes and foreign dyes. That objection has been in part removed by the substitution of the Federal Tariff Commission—to issue license without discrimination to all applicants. I was further opposed to it for the reason that the dye business in this country now, according to my notion, is absolutely controlled by the men who own the German patents. It stands to reason that the Germans, in filing their patents over here, would file those patents which science in their laboratories has invented which are most modern and most up to date and the most valuable patents. These patents have gone into the hands of the Chemical Foundation, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] says the trustees who handle these patents have no pecuniary interest in the patents; that they are merely trustees. But there was not one word that he uttered that would give anyone any reason to believe that anyone might go to the Chemical Foundation and get the use of these foreign patents. They made no declaration of trust that they hold these patents for the indiscriminate use of American citizens.

Now, then, if the men who own these patents shall control the dye business in this country, as undoubtedly they will, any person outside of that favored circle is prevented from getting foreign dyes or going to any other market than the market of the American monopoly. It seems to me that a high tariff would stop all this. I know after the war of 1812, when the textile interests of this country, through the embargo, had got a little start, that Lord Brougham, in the British Parliament, said:

> It would be well worth our while to send $150,000,000 of textile stuffs over to the American market and destroy their infant industries over there.

But a protective tariff supplanted the embargo of war and our industries were saved. Why can we not do the same thing in stopping the Germans unloading upon this market? [Applause.] Not, indeed, by estimating your ad valorem duties upon what they say the goods are worth in Europe, but by valuing the imported goods at what they are worth in the market here, and then soak them with your high tariff.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that would be a remedy. It would prevent this unloading of German goods on this market, and it would be uniform throughout all the country, and it would do away with the necessity of having any more of these Government commissions. The country is tired of them. The possession of the German patents give the owners a rock-ribbed monopoly, unless all manufacturers are free to use them on equal terms—and when I ask if they are free on equal terms the gentleman from North Carolina can only tell us that the trustees are fine gentlemen who have no pecuniary interest in the patents. That is no answer at all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. If there is no further debate the Chair will——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to criticize the leader of the Republican side for raising the question of sectionalism in regard to tariff matters, but I think it is fair in passing to say that I have not heard anyone discuss this problem as a regional or sectional matter. The whole question is whether we are going to pass a protective tariff bill without a monopolistic feature added to it.

The gentleman from Wyoming unquestionably will vote to protect wool in his section of the country, and I have always voted to protect his raw material and give him the highest possible duty. I have not understood as a Republican that we have had any differences upon that question, but that we have rather endeavored to teach the doctrine of protection in this House from one end of the country to the other, and if possible to have our Democratic friends thoroughly understand that situation.

I find in the New York Sun an editorial saying that vast quantities of wool are coming in from Australia. Does the gentleman from Wyoming desire to protect American wool and encourage the growth and development of it here? I am anxious to stand with the gentleman on that. I have always stood with him on that. But when I read in the same paper in an editorial about what our competitors on the other side are doing I question whether we ought not to be able to obtain raw materials here with which to enter into the trade of the world.

In this editorial the New York Sun this morning says:

> WIDE-AWAKE BRITAIN ALREADY CAMPED IN GERMANY.
> Great Britain, the paramount world trader before the war, was back on the job before the ink on the treaty of peace was dry. By all signs she is rearranging her commercial compacts, even with Germany, before the other Allies have ratified the treaty or have finished debating it. In the last several peace months she has increased her exports some three-quarters of a billion of dollars. Wise old England! Able manager and trained negotiator, she was planning it all out while the battles waged. She was ready for it when the firing ceased.
> Great Britain is taking in many cargoes from Germany. She is delivering many cargoes into Germany. The cables tell us that she already has proceeded so far with this readjustment and resumption of former trade relations that the Germans have authorized in Berlin a British board of control to regulate the German goods that shall be permitted to go into the markets of the United Kingdom and the British goods that are to have smooth sailing into the markets of the German States.
> This seems to be one good answer to those who think that Germany is more or less permanently restrained from stepping back into international trade because of her inability to get raw material. On the face of it she is getting enough raw material for an exchange of trade with the stupendous British market. On the face of it, too, British capital, British credit, and British sources of supply will abundantly provide for German industries all the raw materials they may require to revive and maintain the old flow of traffic between the two mortal enemies of yesterday.
> Another good answer is in the cables which are so busy in these days with reports of German financial, industrial, and commercial conditions. They advise us of arrangements now negotiating in Argentina for a German credit there of $100,000,000—Argentina, relatively a speck on the vast international trade field! From Argentina Germany can get on that credit not merely such supplies as grain and meats; she can get such raw materials as flax and wool for cloth and clothing, hides for shoes and harness, and other leather articles.
> Still another answer seems to be in those cables which are also telling of the revival of industry in the Essen district. In Germany, in all Europe, mention of the Essen district conveys to the minds of men what in this country is conveyed to American minds by the term Pittsburgh district. The Essen district is not yet what it was. It will not be for many a day. Nevertheless trustworthy reports are that it is not destitute of iron and steel; it is not destitute of coal. There is enough of these materials to yield a high production once the readjustment and reorganization are completed. As a matter of fact, in some of the industries there are mills and factories now working with two eight-hour shifts, and even three eight-hour shifts, a day.
> With the German people willing to work, ready to work, determined to work, German industry can get raw materials the world over on the straight, simple business proposition of bank discounts. German industry can take the hides of Argentina, manufacture them, export them, sell them, take up with the proceeds in a few months the notes on which the raw material was bought, with a handsome profit on the transaction left in German pockets.
> German industry can do the same thing with American copper. German industry can do the same thing with American cotton. German industry can do the same thing with other American raw material. But it is Great Britain, shrewd, vigilant, painstaking, which is on the job of resuming business with German industry. It is Great Britain which now has the edge in Germany on American producers. It is Great Britain which is writing double mortgages on German trade, outward bound and inward bound.
> Meanwhile, Mr. Wilson's sole ambition, and the chief labor of the United States Government, is his league of nations. To everything else we are asleep, while wideawake Britain, wideawake Holland, wideawake Argentina, wideawake everybody else gets the business with wideawake Germany.

This editorial indicates that we must have protective tariff measures in this country, and that we must have the facilities for manufacturing and developing here, or our allies, who have control of the trade routes of the world to-day, will be on the job long ahead of us.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Gen. HULINGS] has made what I regard as one of the crux speeches in this whole debate. He has referred to the German patents seized by this combination in the Alien Property Custodian's office and turned to their own use, this combination which leases out these patents upon royalties and derives an income therefrom. I think the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BURROUGHS] in his speech said that these patents, about 4,500 in number—I have seen the list of them and it makes a good-sized printed book—cover all the dyestuffs that the ingenuity of German scientists could devise.

Now, when they had influence in the United States they protected themselves by taking out patents upon these devices under our patent laws. These gentlemen down in the Alien Property Custodian's office, whether rightfully or wrongfully, whether they have covered themselves against damage suits by securing a provision in the treaty of peace, seized those patents and applied them to themselves. Now, may I ask my friends on this side and my friends on the other side this: Given rates which make a prohibitive tariff against German dyes, do not the dye makers have in the possession of those German patents in the United States a weapon that makes them almost invincible? They not only want a high protective tariff, for which I stand, but they want a licensing commission to dominate the business and hold up the prices, and they want also to exercise the right to use every German patent in the United States, patents which they seized and sold to themselves. They are not actually suing those who use these dye materials, or attempt to make them in the United States, for infringements of the patents which they took from the Germans. And yet gentlemen will insist on this floor that we are in danger of a foreign invasion of these dyestuffs. I wish you would call your own witness, Dr. Taussig, the head of the Tariff Board, and ask him, in view of his recent visit to Europe, whether or not there is any danger of a foreign invasion of dyestuffs. He is not attached to any of these consolidations or any of these concerns that are grabbing a monopoly here.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish there was some remedy that could be applied that would cure this Chemical Foundation rabies which afflicts the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. It makes no difference what you believe about the Chemical Foundation. It has not one single thing in the world to do with the motion before the House. The motion before the House is to strike out the words "dye licensing commission" and substitute "United States Tariff Commission." What on the face of the earth has any fact connected with the Chemical Foundation got to do with the merits of that amendment, or how does it throw any light upon it? The bill says one kind of board shall constitute the dye licensing commission. This amendment substitutes for that the United States Tariff Commission as the dye licensing commission. Yet the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] can not get the Chemical Foundation out of his mind. If I had been nominated for as big a thing as the mayor of as big a city as Philadelphia I would not show that I was so blessed scared and frightened of the Chemical Foundation. [Laughter.] Why, the gentleman ought to have more manhood, more courage, more bravery than to be frightened out of his boots and go into fits every time anybody mentions the Chemical Foundation. [Laughter.] If Gen. HULINGS had not mentioned the Chemical Foundation the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would have kept his head cool and would have discussed the real proposition before the House upon its merits; but just as soon as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] mentioned the Chemical Foundation or its officers I looked over there and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was trembling in his shoes. [Laughter.] Why, you never saw a man so frightened at anything. The little child in the nursery is not half as afraid of the goblins and ghosts as this gentleman is of the Chemical Foundation. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, the only question in this motion is whether the members of the license commission shall be composed of these different representatives of private interests and shall be appointed by private corporations and not be amenable or responsible to the Government or subject to Government control, but responsible to those corporations only, or whether the officers who administer this license provision shall be Government officers, governmental agencies responsible to the Government. The only thing in the proposition before the House is whether the United States Tariff Commission shall be the license commission or whether the commission appointed by the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, the National Association of Woolen Manufacturers, the National Association of Leather Manufacturers, and the National Association of Druggists, as the bill now provides, shall constitute that board.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] says that the gentleman from North Carolina failed to answer his question yesterday.

Mr. HULINGS. No, I did not say that. I said that the gentleman from North Carolina, after stating that these trustees had entire control and had no interest in the business, failed to say that any person, any American manufacturer could go there and get the use of these dyes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman must have been talking to somebody and did not hear what I said. The gentleman asked a question, and here is my answer on page 5928:

> This license or permit to use these patents must be granted, by the terms of the charter and articles of agreement, by these trustees to every manufacturer of dyes in the United States, big or little.

That answers the question. Every one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the committee.

Mr. HULINGS. I have been waiting for a couple of days, and everybody has barked, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has bullyragged me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a final word on the subject to see if I can correct a misapprehension which seems to exist. The gentleman from Indiana said that no evidence had been presented here as to the necessity of a provision against the German dumping. Of course, we can not now state the actual figures of what Germany has on hand. We have had no access to her factories during the war, but this we do know, that Germany had on hand at the beginning of the war enough dyes to supply not only the American market but the markets of the world. And we know further that every one of her factories which was devoted in part to turning out poisonous gases and chemicals at the same time turned out dyes. So it is necessarily true that to-day in Germany there is a tremendous supply of dyes and coal-tar chemicals. In one factory alone they turn out 11,000 different colors.

What is the situation of Germany to-day? She has this enormous stock of dyes and chemicals piled up. Where is she going to get rid of them? Almost the day that the war was over England, France, and Japan adopted the system proposed in this bill that shut out all these dyes. So the only market that remains to Germany to-day is the American market. Is it conceivable that Germany will not use every effort to get a foothold in this market, regardless of the cost, to make it possible in years to come for her to sell in this market again, without any competition, at whatever price she pleases?

Is there a gentleman on the floor of this House that believes it is good policy—and I leave Germany out of the question—that it is good policy for this Nation to open its markets wide to nations who close their markets absolutely against us? Is there a man here who will say that it is good policy to say to Great Britain, who prohibits the importation of dyes into its markets, that "we will open our markets to their importations," and also say so to France and Japan? There is not a man on either side of the House who would advocate that as a governmental policy, and yet if you do not pass this licensing system that is exactly what you are doing.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is under a serious misapprehension, which I have tried a number of times to relieve, that this so-called Chemical Foundation controls all of these patents. It does not, because they are licensed to countless manufacturers. But if it did it would only relate to the control of one-sixth of the dyes produced to-day in this country, or produced in Germany for that matter. Talk about a monopoly, at most if this Chemical Foundation were all the pack of grafters that it is seemed to be insinuated they are, the worst they could do would be to affect or control one-sixth of the total American markets. It is too absurd to talk about. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, frankly I am somewhat embarrassed in using this time. I am not on this committee; I never was on the Ways and Means Committee. I have had a hard time when you come to the details of schedule to make up my own mind how I shall vote. But there is one general principle that is in my mind, notwithstanding I am not competent to make schedules, and that is that the Republican policy of protection is a policy that I stand for and always have stood for. [Applause.]

Let me state right now that if we are to have a licensing system, if you have got to take your hat in your hand from the Pacific to the Atlantic and come down to Washington and present your case, rather than have the license system reported in this bill, I should be inclined to vote for the amendment. If we have got to have it, I want it as harmless as possible. So much for that.

I have listened to both sides of the House in which you say that in this bill the protection from the protective standpoint is high enough. I think nobody disputes it, and yet it is stated that the value of the German mark is 24 or 25 cents in Germany, but outside of Germany, when it comes to the United States, the value of that mark is 5 cents minus. Somebody says 3, but whichever it is it makes no difference for the purpose I am using it. If they have all the dyestuffs and chemicals that the gentleman from Ohio says ready to dump on our market, they dump them at 24 cents, the value of the German mark in Germany, on the American market, while it is only worth 3 or 5 cents in value in the United States.

Well, if that is so, then God knows we need more protection than the present law gives, because it could be dumped upon this country. If the apprehension of the gentleman from Ohio and other gentlemen who agree with him is correct, I wish there was a bill pending reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, and I would be glad to vote for it, to say that the goods and dyes imported from anywhere are to be gauged by the American dollar when the duties are levied. I do not know whether that would be germane or not to this bill. If it is, I hope somebody will offer the amendment, and I think that would dispose of the fear of unloading unnumbered shiploads of German dyes before we can get to work and make the fast-colored dyes. It seems to be a question of fast-colored dyes, and that is all I want to say about that. Gentlemen, the United States is the greatest producer of manufactured and agricultural products, thank God, of any nation on earth. I think I am correct in that. I am told, it has been stated and not denied, that the value of the products of the various people who are making something that uses dyes is three billions of dollars annually. Am I correct? If I am not, I stand to be corrected. Now, then, they say that they can not get fast colors. They talk about these patents, 4,500 of them, that have been taken over. I do not know hardly whether I would know a patent if I met it in the center of the aisle here, as far as that is concerned, but I know it is something that protects the patentee, and I know that whoever owns those patents, 4,500, practically run and glorify taking that knowledge. Have we capital enough in this country to develop this industry? They speak about the necessity for munitions and the necessity for dyestuffs—they seem to be twins—but during this great war, when we were thrown back upon our own efficiency, we made pretty good munitions, and we have made fairly good progress with dyestuffs. We have got the capital.

Now, I have no brief in defending or attacking this company that has been incorporated to take over these patents, not at all. I have no brief for or against the capitalists who have made munitions, the Du Ponts and others. God knows how many hundred people there are manufacturing dyestuffs in the United States. I can not tell, but I gather, which I think has not been denied, that the corporation which owns these 4,500 patents can run and glorify and charge royalties, not at a uniform price, or possibly even at a uniform price, but that they can discriminate if they so desire and establish a great monopoly. I am for the Republican policy of protection. What for? First, to control our own markets, everything that we can produce in the United States. Second, to have a surplus that we can compete in the markets of the world wherever it is practicable. That is the Republican protective policy. I rarely disagree with the majority leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I have a very high respect for him. He is one Representative from Wyoming, and two Senators—I forget how many from my State, I think 27 or 28. It does not make any difference whether there is one or twenty. The majority leader is very competent, but you know, New York first, Chicago second, the first and second manufacturing cities of this country; Philadelphia is third. Why, great heavens, dyestuffs are used galore from at least the Atlantic Ocean north and south to the mountains, and, thank God, at last, at last, that splendid South, you know, has got onto the necessity of diversifying its activities, and it will grow and grow. [Applause.] Now, I do not want a monopoly created in the United States with great capital, with power to fix the royalties in a corporation that my friend from Pennsylvania thinks is not a desirable one. I do not know whether it is or not, but if you could head it by Moses and throw in Aaron, if you could resurrect him, and take the greatest half dozen or dozen people who ever did live and who live now and give them these 4,500 patents, why, you know civilization rests upon the selfishness of the unit, and I am just apprehensive that maybe they may abuse it if they had it. If they do, we will have to legislate against them and prosecute them in the courts and probably would have a much better case in that than all this propaganda and hurrah against the packers.

The packers abound in my State—in Missouri—you know, in Minnesota, and various other places. They say they make 2 per cent profit on their total business. I do not know whether they make more or less. I know the meat supply and the food supply that comes handled by them beats all to pieces the system before the days of the railroads, when in the little township in which I lived as a boy once every two weeks we killed a beef, which was generally lean, and it was distributed from a dry goods box, and when I went down on one occasion to get my share, when somebody else had killed the beef, they gave me the neck [laughter] and mother said that she would not send me again. [Laughter and applause.] Oh, gentlemen, I do not know whether the packers are oppressing this country. I hold no brief to defend them, but it is no use to talking, they beat my ancient recollection before they came on, because they utilize all the by-products. Now, as I say, I hold no brief for them, and I can say that, in my judgment, it would have been far better if the United States had taken over the 4,500 German patents, at $250,000 for these 4,500 patents, and made a royalty that any American citizen, any producer, whether in Pennsylvania, or Illinois, or Kentucky, or anywhere else, could go and have a fixed law and regulation as to royalty and as to the price [applause] if they should get it from Uncle Sam.

I have been trying—and I speak in the most perfect good faith—to find out whether I would vote for this bill or not. I will tell you what I will vote for. If the Ways and Means Committee, either by amendment to this bill or by a separate bill, will report it to the House, I will vote for an antidumping clause anywhere in our markets. It is pretty difficult to compete with Canada, to compete with Great Britain, and to compete with other countries, where in 24 hours, if they discover dumping, they can, through a council representing the Government, raise or lower the duties on imports as against the United States or anywhere else in the world. The Republicans would have to have an election, if not two elections, in which to talk about free trade and protection, and then the protection bill would have to go to the Senate, and the Senate would have to mull over it, and in the fullness of time it would go down to the President, maybe for a veto or maybe for approval, and it takes sometimes 24 months, and sometimes three or four or five or six years before we can change our laws for protection or free trade. Therefore we are at a disadvantage.

I want to see before this session of Congress adjourns, because I believe it is important, that we have an antidumping bill to vote for. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it has been my desire, if we are to have a licensing commission, that that commission shall be just as far removed from political influence as possible. I think that is a matter of very great importance. For that reason I suggested when we were having hearings that if we were to have a commission I wanted it appointed from men on the outside and not appointed by the administration.

Only a few minutes ago I had a talk in my office with a gentleman who is a member of the Tariff Board. The gentlemen who make up the Tariff Board to-day are very high-class men, and I have the highest regard for them. Their work is research work. They have no administrative power. They would not have the power to administer this law if you should substitute the Tariff Board for the commission provided for in this bill. Of course, the administrative power might be given them, but they have no power to-day to perform other than research work, not even the power to recommend to Congress, let alone administering our tariff laws. And that is what this is—a tariff law. As I was saying, a gentleman, a member of that Tariff Board, told me only a few minutes ago that if we wanted to destroy the Tariff Board we should substitute the Tariff Board for this commission. As I have said, that was his individual opinion, expressed to me in my room only a few minutes ago. I told him what the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. That is a striking answer, and it is disturbing to me, for I had expected to vote for this amendment. I do not want to openly vote for an amendment that would destroy the function of the Tariff Board.

Mr. FORDNEY. He said to me, "Do not use my name unless you think it necessary; but if you do use it, say that I speak as an individual and not for the board." He said, "If you wish to destroy the Tariff Commission, pass that amendment, and we are gone." That is the language which he used.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did he give the gentleman a reason why it would destroy the commission by putting another duty on it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. He said, "It places upon our board an entirely different work from that for which it was created, and we are wholly unfit to administer that law, because we have had no experience. Our work is research work—to furnish information to the administration and to Congress." And that is correct. They are doing an extraordinary work, gentlemen. They are among the best men that could be selected.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Did the gentleman mention to the gentleman a way out of this, or suggest another method by which we could dispose of it?

Mr. FORDNEY. He only said, "For heaven's sake, do not substitute the Tariff Board for the commission." That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will fail, because I am much more in favor of the commission as it is written in the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to ask the gentleman: Did Mr. Page, the acting chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, tell him whether or not, in his opinion, we ought to have a licensing system at all? Did he not tell you that?

Mr. FORDNEY. He did not, sir.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did you ask him his opinion about that?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I did not want to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was somewhat curious.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not ask him that. I have an opinion of my own, and I do not want advice on this subject. I have sense enough to know it is un-American and un-Republican. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question before the committee is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], which the Clerk, without objection, will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 9, line 7, insert, after the word "obtained," the words "as hereinafter provided"; in the same line, after the word "the," strike out the words "dye licensing commission" and insert "United States Tariff Commission"; and in line 8 strike out the words "hereinafter created."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair, the ayes have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to strike out the section as amended, section 503 (a).

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the debate has not been exhausted on that, has it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the debate is exhausted on both motions.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is exhausted on both.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out the section as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 86.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on that vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen who desire to support the demand for tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] A sufficient number have risen. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 503 (b). A commission is hereby created to be known as the dye licensing commission, which shall be composed of 11 commissioners. The said commissioners shall be designated as follows:

One by the National Association of Wool Manufacturers.

One by the American Association of Wool and Worsted Manufacturers.

One by the National Council of American Cotton Manufacturers.

One by the National Association of Finishers of Cotton Fabrics.

One by the Silk Association of America.

One by the American Paper and Pulp Association.

Three by the American Dyes Institute.

One by the American Drug Manufacturers' Association.

The 10 commissioners thus designated shall elect the remaining commissioner, who shall be a person not actively connected with any industry which manufactures or consumes products covered by the act and shall be the chairman of the commission.

The first commissioners, other than the chairman, shall be designated as above provided as soon as possible after the taking effect of this act and shall serve during the life of the commission. Vacancies shall be promptly filled for the unexpired term by a new designation by the association represented by the commissioner whose position has become vacant.

Each of the said associations shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury, immediately upon the designation by it of a commissioner or commissioners under this act, a copy certified by its secretary of the resolution of the association effecting such designation.

The chairman elected by the first commissioners shall serve permanently during the whole of said period unless and until removed by a majority vote of the commission. The chairman shall be the medium of all communications to and from the commission. The commissioners shall serve without salary, except the chairman, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

To meet the reasonable expenses of the commission, including the salary of the chairman, the cost of maintenance of a suitable office at a place to be designated by the commission, and the necessary traveling expenses of the commissioners in attending meetings of the commission, the commission may charge a reasonable fee for the issue of each license. Should the moneys received from such fees in any year be less than the said expenses the deficiency, not exceeding $50,000, shall be paid out of the appropriation for "expenses of collecting the revenue from customs."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Strike out all of section 503 (b) down to and including the word "annum" on page 11, line 4.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will finish the reading of the motion for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time, insert the words "United States Tariff"; in line 6, strike out the words "including the salary of the chairman" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in executing the duties imposed upon it by this act."

In lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "and the necessary traveling expenses of the commissioners in attending meetings of the commission."

In line 13, strike out the words "not exceeding $50,000."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this is simply an amendment to strike out the provisions that were in the original bill and which have no application to the paragraph now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts wish to be heard on his point of order against the amendment?

Mr. WALSH. In view of the fact that the amendment has been read and the committee by its action has made some changes in the provisions of the bill, I will withdraw my point.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to strike out the remainder of the section?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I understand the section has been read in full. I desire to move to strike out the section as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the section as amended. Does he desire recognition?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 503 (c). The said dye-licensing commission shall issue licenses to import for use in domestic manufacture such of the products covered by section 503 (a) of this act, and such products only, as may be unobtainable from domestic sources on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery. The commission shall limit the issue of licenses to import any product as nearly as may be to the quantities required by the actual current needs of the consuming industries in the United States, having regard to the necessities of such industries as are unable to determine beforehand their requirements. Nothing herein contained shall authorize the commission to refuse a license to a manufacturer, person, or agent to import for actual use by the manufacturer a foreign dye when such domestic dye of equal quality is not immediately available for his use.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 11, line 15, after the word "said," strike out the words "Dye Licensing" and insert the words "United States Tariff."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is simply to comply with the amendment heretofore adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 11, line 16, after the word "for," strike out the words "use in"; in lines 16 and 17, strike out the word "manufacture" and insert "consumption"; in line 18, strike out the words "and such products only"; in line 19, after the word "sources," insert the following: "and also such and such only of the said products as may, though obtainable from domestic sources, be unobtainable."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch the Clerk's reading of the words "use in."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 16 strike out the words "use in."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the paragraph as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 503 (c). The said United States Tariff Commission shall issue licenses to import for domestic consumption such of the products covered by section 503 (a) of this act as may be unobtainable from domestic sources, and also such, and such only, of the said products as may, though obtainable from domestic sources, be unobtainable on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this provision as amended will read:

SEC. 503 (c). The United States Tariff Commission shall issue licenses to import for domestic consumption such of the products covered by section 503 (a) of this act as may be unobtainable from domestic sources and also such, and only such, of the said products as may, though obtainable from domestic sources, be unobtainable on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery.

The object is to make it mandatory on the commission to license wherever the dye is not manufactured or obtainable in this country and then in addition, in all cases where the dye, though obtainable, is not obtainable on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman want to make the provision mandatory on the Tariff Board to issue licenses?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Where the dye is not obtainable in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Who is to determine whether it is obtainable, the commission or the man making the application?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The commission, of course. The commission has a complete census of the dye manufacturers of this country, a list of all the factories, and of all the dyes made there.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then the power vested in the Tariff Board will be absolutely discretionary?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It will not be discretionary at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely; according to the language of your amendment it leaves it within their discretion to say whether or not these dyes are obtainable on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It makes it mandatory on them to act on certain facts, and it is a fact whether the dyes are made in this country or not. There is absolutely no discretion about that.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is within the discretion of the board to say whether they are right or whether the man making the application for the license is right, and from their decision there is no appeal.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They find the facts.

Mr. FORDNEY. Suppose they find there are dyes obtainable when there are no dyes obtainable?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 12, line 4, after the word "use," insert "The commission in passing upon applications for such licenses may regulate its own practice and procedure, but shall so regulate the same as to prevent all avoidable delay."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Ohio any further amendments?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No further amendments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the section as amended.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, who has made various verbal changes in this section, that in line 3, on page 12, it occurs to me that the word "such" is not appropriate—

When such domestic dye of equal quality is not immediately available for his use.

There is nothing that makes the word "such" appropriate there, and it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That amendment was suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and we had some debate about it in the committee. He insisted that the word "such" ought to go in there. I am not entirely sure that it ought to be there.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was very insistent upon it, and in his absence I do not think we ought to strike it out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Strike out all of section 503 (c), as amended.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 503 (d). In passing upon applications for licenses, each commissioner, including the chairman, shall cast one vote. Licenses shall be issued only upon a majority vote of the commission present, except that the commission by regulation may provide for the issuance of licenses by the chairman alone, in accordance with general regulations adopted and issued by the commission. The decision of the chairman upon application for such licenses shall be subject to appeal to the commission in such manner as the commission may by general regulation provide. In other respects the commission may regulate its own practice and procedure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. BUTLER. That ought to go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the paragraph. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on his motion?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. The section is unnecessary, in view of the amendments already adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, throughout this discussion some gentlemen have declared that they were entirely satisfied with the tariff provisions of this bill, but that they could not support the licensing feature of it. I want to say, not only as a Member of the House but as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, that I shall feel it my duty to vote against this bill, since it has been decided to carry this un-American, un-Republican, and uneconomic licensing system in it. [Applause.] I believe the bill to have been born under auspices that were not favorable to the welfare of the manufacturers and the industrialists of the country. I believe it was framed under auspices wholly in the interest of a class of men who control large industries and large amounts of capital, and that it is in effect intended to create a monopoly in the disposal of dyestuffs in the United States. I believe this bill would not have been brought out of the Ways and Means Committee if it had been known to certain members of the committee, who are not present to-day, that the system of licensing which they were finally induced to favor would be transferred from those engaged in the business to a governmental commission, which in this instance happens to be the Tariff Commission. I think I can say, with respect to at least three members of the Ways and Means Committee, that they insisted before this bill was voted out of the committee that the representatives of the consumers of dyestuffs should be members of the commission if a commission was formed.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Five.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] suggests that there were five members of the committee who stood against the proposition of permitting a commission to be created unless it was created of men amply interested and informed upon the subject of dyestuffs; that is to say, the users of the dyestuffs. They voted to bring this bill out only with the understanding that these large interests that had to buy dyestuffs from the manufacturers would be represented. Men engaged in the manufacture of wool, those engaged in the manufacture of woolens and worsteds, those engaged in the manufacture of cotton, those engaged in the finishing of cotton, those engaged in the manufacture of silk, those engaged in the manufacture of paper and pulp, and those engaged in the manufacture of drugs. Those were the men upon whom a majority of Republicans in the committee placed their reliance, because they knew, or felt at least, that if these men were represented on this commission there might be an opportunity to get a square deal with the manufacturers of dyes.

I am speaking for some gentlemen who are not present, and I am making the assertion that the committee has deliberately introduced a new proposition here, has installed the Tariff Commission, which was never designed for any such purpose, and has blotted out any representation that the dye users had on the commission.

I feel that Republicans will be justified in defending the protective tariff and voting this bill down. It should be a protective tariff bill without the licensing system. I do not believe it can become law with the licensing feature attached.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, anticipating a motion to recommit with instructions to strike out the rates of duty provided in this bill and substitute lower rates, which would not be debatable, I want to make a few remarks.

The purpose of the provisions of this bill is to encourage home production and the employment of American capital and labor by providing the necessary protection to the manufacturers of the United States that they may pay the American laborers the American scale of wages, the best-paid labor in the world.

The American manufacturer pays local, city, county, State, and national taxes to sustain local and national governments.

Under free trade, or rates of duty below a point of protection, the foreigner is enabled to capture our markets and embarrass or destroy our industrial institutions, and the foreigner pays no taxes to our governments. The foreigner employs no American labor; he consumes no American raw material. In other words, from the manufacture of foreign goods our people derive no benefits whatsoever.

About three-fourths of all our imports at the present time—which now come in in greater quantities than ever before—are admitted free, and the ad valorem rates of duty on the other imports are below any ad valorem rates provided for in any former tariff law written upon our statute books, even from the organization of the States into a Republic. In fact, the present tariff law has thrown down the bars and invited the goods of all foreign countries to come in and enjoy our markets, to the detriment of our own industries.

Therefore the Republican Party presents this measure to the Congress of the United States, and, if it passes both Houses, will ask the President to approve and sign the same. [Applause.]

Therefore, gentlemen, I appeal to you when the time comes to vote for the final passage of this bill to sustain the rates provided for in this bill and vote down any motion to reduce them to a lower standard, because the rates that are written here are not more than sufficient to adequately protect American capital and the American scale of wages in this country over and above the wage scale paid to any people on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I recognize that the House is very impatient as we are approaching the close of this strife over the bill, but there is one aspect of this question that has been passed over in a very cursory manner, and as the representative of a profession which has only three members in this House—two others besides myself—I thought it was a proper proceeding for me to enlarge upon one feature of this tariff bill which concerns that profession and which profession concerns the health and sanitation of 110,000,000 people.

It is not my purpose to discuss this measure as it relates to industrialism, the national necessity for munitions for war, nor its relation to the arts and sciences. All of these subjects have been fully and elaborately covered. What I desire to do is to call the attention of the House to a phase of the subject which has received but scant mention and practically no consideration. Before, however, I take up this particular phase of the subject, I desire to say that there never has been, in my judgment, a proposition before this House for the encouragement and the development of a national enterprise greater than this relating to the dye industry. In my judgment the protective tariff which built up the great iron and steel industry, until we became the greatest steel-producing country in the world, was no more important, as far as our civilization is concerned. The wonder is not that we are taking up this matter now, but that proper laws were not enacted to develop this great enterprise years ago.

Leaving out of consideration the national necessity for dyes and chemicals for offensive and defensive purposes in war, there is a supreme necessity from the standpoint of the health of our 110,000,000 people for the passage of this act.

Within less than 40 years, beginning in 1881, synthetical chemistry of the coal-tar products began. The first substances evolved were known as kairine and following soon after other antipyretic derivatives of quinoiline. From that hour a wonderfully increasing and constantly augmenting number of medicinal agents have been evolved. Owing to these synthetical processes in the laboratory in exploration of this crude and unsightly substance, the pharmacopœas of 40 years ago have been largely displaced by products possessing the highest remedial potency, not only upon the functional but the organic diseases of the human body. They comprehend a wide range of uses. From this same coal tar we have drugs that lessen or increase the flow of blood in the brain; those that depress or stimulate the heart action; those that cause quick diaphoresis and diuresis and catharsis from phenophthelin. We have also the germicidal agents like salol, and eurotropin for intestinal uses in typhoid and other conditions. We have that group of splendid remedies known as the salycylates so beneficient in the treatment of the various rheumatic conditions. In addition to these we have numbers of other remedies of almost incomparable worth in the treatment of influenzas, catarrhal conditions, epidemics of grip, together with the various forms of neuralgia, and, last, that wonderful substance, salvarsan, which promises to be a cure for a plague which threatens the vitality and even the preservation of the race. When we reflect that all this change in medicine has been evolved in less than 40 years, and that the analytical and synthetical chemist stands only on the confines of this dark but illimitable domain of discovery, and that its future will be, beyond peradventure, more extensively beneficient than it has been in the past, there is every reason why the Congress should encourage and foster and safeguard and develop this natural power for the protection of the people, even if there existed no imperative necessity for this purpose for the development of our industrial establishments or for our national defense.

But I desire to say at this point that there are, I fear, many who are too optimistic as to American accomplishment in the two years mentioned in this act. Within that time, I have no doubt, that great accomplishments will be made in dyestuffs and explosives and even in pharmaceutical remedies, but it should be recalled that this is a vast and practically unexplored field of research, and while the fortunate possession of the German patents with their dye formulas taken over by the Government will materially aid our chemists, yet in the future we will have to compete with the most patient and devoted scientist the world has ever known—the German chemist, who will not be content with what he has achieved, but will go on to higher and higher developments in this mysterious domain of coal-tar products that will make the accomplishments of the present seem crude and obselete. In this crude substance called coal tar we really have the concrete life of those ages of the world before man came to inhabit it. It represents the stored up potentiality of the vegetable world before human life had an existence. We have only begun to extract some of its wonderful forces that have an infinite variety in usefulness from the materials for increasing charm and beauty to the destruction of life and the curing thereof.

What the policy of the Congress should be is to protect, guard, encourage, and thereby help to develop this illimitable potentiality, no matter whether it be for two years or forever, seeing what a vast and inexhaustible field of usefulness and of necessity is found therein, especially in remedial medicine and sanitation. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWNING, Mr. REED of West Virginia, Mr. FAIRFIELD, and Mr. KELLER had leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 503 (e). Any product described in section 503 (a) of this act which shall be imported into the United States or any of its possessions without license, as provided in said section 503 (a), shall be forfeited and shall be destroyed whenever and wherever found.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have listened to all the discussion upon this bill, both in general debate and under the five-minute rule. It is needless for me to say that I favor that portion of the bill which looks to the protection of the industry. I regret more than I can say the step we have taken to abandon the protective view by the insertion of the license feature, a feature that was backed, as could clearly be understood, by those who were opposed to protection and carried on the floor of the House by others who were with them. I voted for the feature substituting the Tariff Commission with some hesitation. I think it extremely unwise to give even the licensing power to a commission that might show in its decision sectional or partisan decision under stress.

Any man on the floor of the House can see what a pressure might be brought upon this commission, a governmental commission, to make decisions for purposes that are ulterior, and the House would naturally hesitate to put the commission under such a situation and the danger that might come from that pressure. I think there is no doubt but what putting this commission in the bill is constitutional, while I fear that the original commission could not have stood under the Constitution. I think, members of the committee, we have given our pledge to the country that we will not further shackle the business and the enterprise of America. [Applause.] We promised that those shackles placed under the stress of war—that we could not avoid because of the necessity of the war—would be removed with the close of the war, and here is the first opportunity that we have had in this particular line of legislation, and, instead of our removing the shackles, we have taken steps to add to the shackling of business. [Applause.] We have made it inconvenient, made it possible for discrimination; we have introduced un-American lines of legislation as war measures, and we are too careless about respecting our promises to the country, and I hope there will be a motion to recommit with instructions to the committee to strike out this licensing feature and give us a chance for a record vote upon that. [Applause.] I would not vote for a motion to recommit to reduce the protective rates. I am in favor of the rates, but I am not in favor of giving further opportunity to any sort of associations or licenses further to disturb the business of this country, and I want an opportunity to vote on a record vote against that proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, the Republican Party stands for the protective-tariff system. Why? For the purpose of establishing industries, give employment, and make America independent and self-sufficient in an industrial way. The Republican Party will always adhere to that policy and is carrying it out in this bill, but in connection with the industries proposed to be protected the committee found a condition requiring temporarily the use of a policy of licenses in order to accomplish the very thing that a protective tariff was established to do.

Mr. FESS. Will my friend yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In two years from now, when this ceases to be operative, we will be asked to reproduce it.

Mr. MONDELL. We need not, and I trust we will be wise enough not to unless at that time it seems necessary.

Mr. FESS. Why not be wise enough now?

Mr. MONDELL. Because there is a condition demanding, in the opinion at least of a majority of the Republican members of this committee, that for the present a system of licenses be provided——

Mr. FESS. But what assurances have we that it will not be demanded two years from now?

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). And they have brought this provision before the House. The facts will develop whether or no it is necessary to continue licenses. I do not believe it will. I would be willing to limit the license system to one year now. Gentlemen have said it would be possible to make the tariff rate high enough to obviate the necessity of a licensing system even for a day. That is true; but no man in this House would be justified in voting for a tariff rate high enough unquestionably to protect these industries in the immediate future. It is true that the rates could be made high enough to make dyestuffs practically prohibitive in America, but no one wants to vote for such a rate, and the Republican Party can not afford to go on record as in favor of such a rate. The committee has fixed a rate which it believes will protect the industries in the long run and in the immediate future except as to certain classes of dyes and dyestuffs, and in order to protect them it would be necessary to make the rate so high as to be burdensome to the enterprises using dyes. That we do not want to do. We do not want to burden those who must use dyestuffs, but we do want to build up the dyestuff industry, and therefore the temporary expedient of adding to our tariff this provision for licensing. It is not adopted as a permanent system, and personally I should regret if it should ever become a permanent part of our policy. I studied the question very carefully as presented to the committee before I came to the conclusion that the majority of the committee was sound in their belief that in addition to such a tariff rate as we are justified in voting for it was necessary for a brief period, in order to establish these industries, to provide the licensing system carried in the bill. In my opinion it is just as important a part of the work of establishing these industries as the tariff provisions carried in the bill. If I had not become convinced of that after careful study and consideration, I should not be in favor of it; but I am convinced that the judgment of the committee is sound. We avoid a prohibitive tariff rate, which none of us want to vote for, and, having fixed a reasonable rate, we supplement that by a temporary provision for licensing. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 12, line 16, strike out all of section 503 (e).

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 503 (f). Any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States who shall, either as principal or as accessory, import or attempt to import or aid in importing any product described in section 503 (a) of this act without license as therein provided shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or the value of such product at the time of importation, whichever shall be greater, or shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 12, line 21, strike out all of section 503 (f).

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I regret the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who has great influence in this House, can not see this matter as the minority of the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means have seen it. I rather suspect if a vote were taken now in the Committee on Ways and Means on the Republican side that a majority of that majority would declare against this bill as it has been amended.

I question whether the deep study the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has given to this bill has penetrated the minds of the members of the committee or that their thoughts have penetrated his mind, since they would not have reported this bill under any circumstances if it had not been understood to the majority of the majority members that there would be representation on this board of the consumers of dyestuffs in the United States. Now, the gentleman from Wyoming comes back to the Republican policy of protection to American industries. He stands for it now as an afterthought, following the rather dubious speech he made on the floor a little while ago about regionalism or sectionalism in protective-tariff matters.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows perfectly well that at no time, here or elsewhere, have I stood for anything except a Republican tariff policy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I did hear the gentleman from Wyoming, in the first speech he made on this bill to-day, from the floor yonder, say that there were those coming from certain sections of the country who were unduly influenced perhaps by the interests round about them, and that they did not express in their protective talk the same care of those in other sections of the country as they did of their own.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to correct his recollection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he will correct it; yes.

Mr. MONDELL. What I said was that I had little patience with those engaging in industries dependent upon the protective system who were not willing to undergo the slight trouble, if trouble it might be, of a license system, when that system was essential to the very system upon which their industries depend.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is substantially what the gentleman said. I took it to mean that the gentleman was reflecting upon those who looked after the interests of their particular constituents in this House.

Mr. MONDELL. There was nothing in what I said that could bear such construction. I think a manufacturer who depends for his business on the protective system should be willing to go to a little trouble to comply with the provisions of a licensing system temporarily if that licensing system is essential to the development of the protective policy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then why should the gentleman, having this small opinion of those whose constituents have these special interests, stand here in the interest of a licensing system contrary to all Republican doctrine, which licensing system is emphatically in favor of a particularly few men who have gathered unto themselves the dye manufacturing industry of the United States? Those interested in dye manufacture have invested less than $400,000,000, while the consumers of the dyestuffs buy and sell to the extent of $3,000,000,000. Why does the gentleman want to differentiate in this instance in favor of the dye manufacturers, who have a monopoly of the business?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have a minute more in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object myself. Question on the motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the first request made?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I think we thoroughly understand the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. I do it, Mr. Chairman, merely for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] a question and yielding to him such time as he wants to answer same. The gentleman seems to be concerned very much about the interest of the ultimate consumer with regard to this bill, stating that the consumers of dyestuffs should have representation on the board. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is willing for the ultimate consumer to have representation on the board with regard to all the other items covered by the tariff, and I yield to him now to answer the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman really want me to answer that?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. For very suddenly the gentleman, for the first time in the history of this Congress, has evidenced a great concern in behalf of the ultimate consumer, whose interests we Democrats know have suffered with respect to every one of the various tariff measures passed by this Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has rediscovered an old charge; that is all. I have spoken consistently here for the ultimate consumer. I have spoken for the farmer, whom the gentleman represents. I have spoken for the farmer who uses the calico and buys the hosiery, and who pays 35 cents now for what he paid 25 cents for before the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The farmer——

Mr. LONGWORTH. About one-tenth of 1 per cent more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It depends on the kind of hosiery the gentleman wears. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, simply to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I rise simply to say that the gentleman seeks to strike out from this bill the penalty which is provided for the violation of a United States statute. It should remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise now and report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Towner, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8078, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to move to recommit. I am on the majority of the committee, but I am opposed to the bill. Would I be recognized for that purpose in due course?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it fair to state that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the leader of the minority on the committee, desires to offer a motion to recommit, and the Chair thinks he should recognize the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment pertaining to the licensing feature of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands a separate vote on the amendments which he will please designate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the amendments to section 503 (a), (b), and (c); all amendments included in section 503.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands a separate vote, as the Chair understands, on all amendments in section 503.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All amendments included in section 503. They are included in paragraphs designated as (a), (b), and (c).

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman want a vote on all the amendments together?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My purpose is to get a record vote on the motion to strike out all these amendments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that that motion was defeated in the committee and can not now be made in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to ask for a separate vote on his motion to strike out. I made the point of order that that would not be in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will have to amend that motion. The Chair has stated that he would give recognition for making a motion to recommit by the gentleman from North Carolina. I am inclined to think I would be entitled to recognition, but, of course, I bow to the statement of the Chair. I want, however, to get a square vote on the question of striking out these licensing provisions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have a square vote on any amendment that was adopted by the committee. The Chair is not familiar with the exact status of the amendments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will state for the benefit of the Chair that the gentleman made a motion to strike out in committee, which was voted down.

The SPEAKER. If it was an amendment that was not adopted in the committee, it could not be voted on now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to get a yea-and-nay vote, if possible, on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would be obliged if the Chair would so state the question, so that the Members may understand that they are voting for or against the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire it to be done on one vote?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks a separate vote on the amendments to section 503. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is debate permitted?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the vote will be taken first on the other amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if one amendment to section 503 was all of the amendments I should vote for it—namely, the amendment to substitute the Tariff Commission—but there are several other amendments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are all the same amendment; they are all in that direction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is in favor of the Tariff Commission, to which I am opposed, he would vote

"aye" on my demand for a separate vote. I would vote "no," with a view to destroying the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The effect of carrying the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be to restore the original bill.

Mr. CANNON. I want, if I can, to have a vote on the amendment substituting the Tariff Commission. I want to get that by itself, because while I am not in favor of a licensing system, I would prefer that it should be administered by the Tariff Commission rather than the dye commission, as provided in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to demand a separate vote on that amendment if it is an amendment by itself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is a separate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have a right to ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many amendments are there to this section?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Seven or eight.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care anything about this squabble over there, but it is not fair to vote on half a dozen amendments in a bunch if there is a dispute about them.

Mr. GARNER. Only on the first amendment of section 503.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to have one vote on all the amendments in a certain section. A man might be in favor of one or two of these amendments and bitterly opposed to the others.

Mr. GARNER. You could not get that under the rules anyway.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The vote is now to be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to strike out certain language in the bill and insert certain other language?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And that vote will be taken first. I was going to suggest that we can not well vote on the other amendments in block, because they are consequential amendments, and should follow the vote now demanded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. PELL. May we have the Clerk report the amendment again?

The SPEAKER. Let us settle this question first. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If, not the Chair will put the other amendments in gross.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Just a moment. That is what I was saying ought not to be done now, because the other amendments are largely consequential amendments, that follow the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman does not understand the Chair. The Chair means all the other amendments outside of the amendments to section 503.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Outside of the consequential amendments?

The SPEAKER. Outside of the amendments to that section.

Mr. LONGWORTH. There were a number of amendments offered to previous sections of the bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. The intention here is to get a vote on the license feature. The gentleman from North Carolina is in favor of this bill, as I understand it?

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from North Carolina in favor of the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to be perfectly frank with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I do not know of anything I have ever uttered on the floor or off the floor, in the debate on this bill or any other bill, which would lead any gentleman to believe that I was in favor of this bill. I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. FESS. Then I withdraw my suggestion. I understood the gentleman was in favor of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not the floor, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Apparently the gentleman from North Carolina intends to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On a question of rates?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I intended to offer a motion to recommit, to raise the question on the licensing feature. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] preferably to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman still desire to offer his motion to recommit?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to offer my motion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to have the agreement between the gentleman from North Carolina and the Speaker violated.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would suggest to the gentleman that he can get a record vote on his proposition by having a separate vote on the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It prevents a square vote on the question of the licensing commission.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that there is no agreement between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the Chair. The Chair was informed by the gentleman from North Carolina that he desired to offer a motion to recommit, and the Chair considers that under the circumstances he ought to give the gentleman from North Carolina priority of recognition, but the gentleman from North Carolina himself did not know who the Chair would recognize until it was just announced by the Chair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, if the Chair will permit me, I will withdraw my suggestion that there was any agreement between the gentleman from North Carolina and the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to all the amendments except those affecting section 503.

The question being taken, the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first vote is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], on which a separate vote is demanded. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 7, after the word "obtained," insert the words "as hereinafter provided"; and in the same line, after the word "the," strike out "dye-licensing commission" and insert in lieu thereof "United States Tariff Commission"; and in line 8 strike out the words "hereinafter created."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The affirmative vote was taken, and the Speaker announced, ayes 125.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present. The House has already divided.

The SPEAKER. The House has not completed the division. Only one side has voted.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to the amendment will rise.

The negative vote was taken, and the Speaker announced, noes 34.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum present, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair thinks no quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONGWORTH) there were 66 ayes and 101 noes.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 207, nays 62, answered "present" 2, not voting 158, as follows:

The commission shall limit the issue of license to import any such articles as nearly as may be to the quantities actually required by the current needs of the applicant, having regard to the necessities of such applicant as is unable to determine beforehand his or its requirements. Nothing herein contained shall authorize the commission to refuse a license to an applicant or his or its agent to import for actual use any such articles when such domestic articles of equal quality are not immediately available for his or its use at a reasonable price.

"To meet the reasonable expenses of the commission incurred in the performance of the duties imposed upon it by this act it may charge a reasonable fee for the issue of each license. Should the moneys received in such fees in any year be less than such expenses, the deficiency, not exceeding $25,000, shall be paid out of the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

"The commission is authorized to make rules and regulations with respect to the issue of licenses provided for in this act.

"SEC. 506. That any article described in section 504 of this act which shall be imported into the United States or any of its possessions without license, as herein provided, shall be forfeited to the United States and destroyed.

"SEC. 507. That any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States who shall, either as principal or as accessory, import or attempt to import or aid in importing any article described in section 504 of this act without license as herein provided shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or the value of such article at the time of importation, if the same shall be greater than $5,000, or shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

"SEC. 508. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this title, except as to the issue of license herein provided for.

SATURDAY, September 27, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we desire to begin this new day by coming into right relations with Thyself, by knowing as far as it is possible for us to know the will of God, by seeking from Thee that grace which will enable us to desire above all things to do Thy will. Help us to-day to keep close to Thee. May Thy spirit brood over us, guiding us to follow the commandments of God and to do the things that are pleasing in Thy sight. Forgive us our sins and fit us for the tasks that have come to us in Thy providence. For Christ's sake. Amen.

WASHINGTON CAMP NO. 13,
PATRIOTIC ORDER SONS OF AMERICA,
Soddy, Tenn., September 23, 1919.

Hon. HENRY C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Be it resolved by the members of Washington Camp No. 13, Patriotic Order Sons of America, Soddy, Tenn., at a regular meeting assembled, That we, the Sons of America, children of her soil, reared beneath the shadow of her flag, loving her as none others can know, having an interest in her future welfare, and to safeguard our free institutions, condemn and are opposed to the league of nations, as written, and we highly approve the stand you have taken in its opposition, believing you to be a true American and opposed to foreign entanglements and foreign influence in the affairs of our Government. We assure you as Sons of America, irrespective of party, our undivided support and influence to the end that we may enjoy the freedom from foreign entanglements and foreign powers; be it further

Resolved, That we ask you statesmen in the Senate of the United States assembled at this critical moment to save our country from the iron chains of slavery and the wiles of foreign influences. We pray that God may shield you from wrong, guide you in your duty, and prepare you for the end, and that your record in this matter will be your proudest monument. Save us; oh, save us! This is the sentiment of our entire membership. Let's all be Americans now.

Attest:

Mr. LODGE. I also present certain resolutions passed by the National Dames of the Civil War, an organization with headquarters at Greenfield, Mass. I ask that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD without reading. I may say that the signers are all Americans.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"We, the National Dames of the Civil War, as an organization, headquarters at Greenfield, Mass., send you, Senator LODGE, our protest in regard to any connection of our country with the so-called league of nations. Our country, the land our noble forefathers fought for, through all those years of suffering, finally, July 4, 1776, declared it free and independent. That was the birth of a new nation; our America; and our fathers dedicated it to "liberty and humanity." It has often been called the Liberty Hall of the World—our America, now the land of the highest civilization, given over to despotic powers. Our glorious Star-Spangled Banner, which represents all the principles, all the virtues, all the grand and loved things our fathers fought for, exchanged for what? Our rightful inheritance, and we have taken our oath that we, to the best of our ability, will protect, preserve, and defend "our inheritance." Are we not now as capable managers of that inheritance as in the past? We are strongly opposed to any connection with other nations. As a free and independent Nation our development has been the wonder of the world; if we remain free and independent our growth will continue. We are for America first, America last, America always and forever, and our Star-Spangled Banner and no other; no, never.

"Names of officers of the National Dames of the Civil War: Mary L. Kimball, commander; Mattie J. Ballon, assistant commander; Harriet Bridges Clary, senior vice commander; ———, second senior vice commander; Elizabeth H. Gillette, junior vice commander; J. L. Hubbard, second junior vice commander; Louise J. Munson, adjutant; Lucy A. Herrick, quartermaster; Nettie Potter, officer of the day; Isabel C. Moore, chaplain.

"Color guards: First, ——— ———; second, Miry Oliver; third, Mrs. Delia C. Crandell; fourth, Mrs. Anna A. Robinson; fifth, Mrs. Sarah O. Sexton; sixth, Laura Hoyet; seventh, Anna Williams; eighth, Fannie Lyons; sentinel, Fannie A. Coates.

"Read, enthusiastically approved, and accepted September 19, 1919, at last encampment.

"Yours, respectfully,

"MRS. HARRIET BRIDGES CLARY,
"North New Salem, by way of Orange, Mass., R. F. D."

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the presiding bishop of Iowa with reference to the position of the Methodist Episcopal Church and urging the ratification of the league of nations. I also desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter sent out by the League to Enforce Peace, addressed to "Dear Fellow Covenanter"; and following that a letter sent out by the Democratic State committee of Iowa to the people, the two letters showing how great minds will think in the same way even to the identical language. Also following that I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter to me from a member of the Democratic State central committee strongly dissenting to the united thought on the question of the league of nations of the League to Enforce Peace and the Democratic State central committee.

There being no objection, the telegram and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DES MOINES, IOWA, September 22, 1919.

Senator W. S. KENYON,
Washington, D. C.:

The Des Moines conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, composed of 275 ministers and representing nearly 70,000 members, urge the early ratification of the peace treaty, including the league of nations.

HOMER C. STUNTZ, Presiding Bishop.
FRED M. WILLIS, Secretary.

LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
September 16, 1919.

(Personal and confidential.)

DEAR FELLOW COVENANTER: Nearly everybody, except political trimmers and self-seekers, wants the peace treaty and covenant ratified without further delay. Humanity, commerce, industry, labor, the whole social order need ratification now. We urge that you immediately write, telephone, telegraph, or visit Senators and demand prompt and unqualified ratification, and that you get other persons of influence who can bring pressure to do so. No matter if you have done this—do it again and in a positive and conclusive manner. Don't wait on others; strike straight from the shoulder now, and put all your might behind the blow.

Faithfully, yours,

W. R. BOYD, Jr.,
National Campaign Manager.
I. T. JONES,
Assistant National Campaign Manager.

DEMOCRATIC STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF IOWA,
Des Moines, Iowa, September 17, 1919.

DEAR SIR: Nearly everybody except political trimmers and self-seekers want the peace treaty and covenant ratified without further delay. Humanity, commerce, industry, labor, the whole social order need ratification now.

I am sure that you agree with us, and to that end we urge that you immediately write, telephone, or telegraph our Iowa Senators and demand prompt and unqualified ratification, and then get others to do the same. No matter if you have done this, do it again, and in a positive and conclusive manner. Don't wait on others. Strike straight from the shoulder now and put all your might behind the blow.

We can accomplish a great deal by so doing, and I trust that you will take care of the matter immediately.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

J. W. REYNOLDS,
Chairman State Central Committee.
G. P. HELMACK,
Secretary Iowa Democratic Club.

THE EMMETSBURG DEMOCRAT,
Emmetsburg, Iowa, September 19, 1919.

Hon. W. S. KENYON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KENYON: I notice that a widespread effort is being made to try to convince you that the people of Iowa are strongly in favor of the adoption by the Senate of the league of nations constitution as it now stands. I think I know the sentiments of the people of our county on this proposition. It is my judgment that at least 80 per cent of our people, regardless of politics, are in thorough sympathy with the action our Senators have already taken in standing for the reservations that have been given publicity. The more the matter is discussed the stronger becomes public feeling against the provisions of the covenant. I sincerely hope you will not flinch, and that if we are to have a league it will safeguard thoroughly the American privileges and principles of which we are all so justly proud.

Very truly, yours,

W. I. BRANAGAN.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have in my hand a petition to Congress in the form of a resolution adopted by the Quarterly Conference of the Methodist Church, held at Canton, S. Dak., which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CANTON, S. DAK., September 22, 1919.

Hon. E. S. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As acting secretary of the Quarterly Conference, held at the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canton, Monday evening, September 21, I was instructed to forward to you a copy of the following resolutions unanimously adopted by the conference, to wit:

"Be it resolved by the members of the quarterly conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canton, S. Dak., now assembled, That we place ourselves on record as unqualifiedly in favor of the "league of nations"; not in the sense that we believe the constitution now before the United States Senate is perfect, but that we are convinced the world needs a league of nations to extend world brotherhood, to prevent the horrors of war, and to reduce the awful burdens placed on the people in preparation for war; and for that purpose we believe the constitution now discussed in the United States Senate is a long step in the right direction; it is further

"Resolved, That we urge Senator STERLING and Senator JOHNSON of South Dakota to use all their influence to effect an early ratification of the treaty of peace and the adoption of the league of nations; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the conference be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to Senator STERLING and Senator JOHNSON, and have them published in the Canton newspapers and in the Sioux Falls Press and Argus Leader."

Yours, very truly,

W. G. LECHNER, Secretary.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have received a large number of telegraphic dispatches within the past three or four days. I ask leave to print some of them in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., September 26, 1919.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The public sentiment of Arizona is running strong in the direction that the peace of the world, the early settlement of the many grave social and economic questions that now confront it, and the maintenance of the present position of the United States for an almost controlling influence in the just solution of such matters are vitally dependent upon the earliest possible ratification of the covenant and treaty without amendment, and we, the undersigned, do earnestly entreat you to oppose reservations, which reservations if any way, in any wise, afford a basis for contending that changes have been made which require the resumption of conference and negotiations among the nations.

Alfred Franklin, John L. Irvin, S. J. Michelson, Alfred C. Sieboth, Clay Leonard, James P. Lavin, C. M. Zander, C. M. Roberts, F. J. K. McBride, Alexander B. Baker, C. O. Case, Henry D. Ross, Con P. GLOBE, ARIZ., September 26, 1919.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If newspaper reports are correct and you have advised President Wilson that you can not support him and must vote for the Johnson amendment, or if you can not support the President in his great work for humanity in furthering the league of nations, it is our opinion that you are not best serving the future welfare of your Nation, and certainly you are not voicing the sentiment of Arizona, whose people you are elected to serve.

(Telegram.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 25, 1919.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Pueblo, Colo.:

Although I have had, as you, of course, know, serious doubts and misgivings as to some parts of the league covenant, I am nevertheless convinced that Germany would obtain a material advantage and would come out of the war practically a victor were the treaty amended or were any reservations adopted.

To my mind, it is this treaty or no treaty, and I for one am not willing to assume the frightful responsibility of precipitating chaos upon the world by some hazardous amendment or reservation.

I have studied this tremendous question from every angle and am sure that at this juncture I can render my country—indeed, the entire civilized world—a great service by voting for the treaty without amendments or reservations.

ASHURST.

(Telegram.)

The Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

May I not express my admiration of your statesmanlike attitude toward the treaty and the sense of gratitude with which I have read your message?

WOODROW WILSON.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., September 26, 1919.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington:

Congratulations on message to President. History will praise your support of treaty without reservations.

W. J. BRYAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., September 26, 1919.

Senator ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Having read in this morning's papers your telegram to the President explaining your position on the ratification of the treaty, we wish to express to you our admiration for your broad-minded viewpoint on a matter so vital to the welfare of our Nation.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., September 26, 1919.

Hon. H. F. ASHURST,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We congratulate you upon your attitude in the peace treaty; we believe it should be ratified immediately without reservations. California women voters will not forget the men who rise above party politics and vote for the cause of common humanity.

WOMEN'S LEAGUE FOR THE PEACE TREATY.

CHICAGO, ILL.

HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

You have struck nail squarely on head. Most important question for Senate to decide is, Shall the United States after 300,000 human casualties and $30,000,000,000 sacrificed play directly into the hands of those who made necessary the sacrifices? Arizona will remember you with gratitude.

D. J. SULLIVAN.

RECEPTION TO THE KING OF THE BELGIANS.

Mr. LODGE. I present an order for the present consideration of which I ask unanimous consent.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., on Saturday October 4, 1919, the Senate will take a recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m. in order to receive in the Senate His Majesty the King of the Belgians.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is unanimously adopted.

CONDITIONS IN INDIA.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, under the rules of the Senate any communication from foreign citizens must come through the Executive department. Therefore, while the Committee on Foreign Relations was very liberal in the matter of hearing those Americans who desired to be heard on subjects entirely foreign to the United States and touching the relations of foreign countries with each other, it was not possible, on account of this rule, to receive evidence in contradiction to the evidence given.

We had before the committee one witness who spoke for the revolutionists in India. An Indian citizen desired to be heard by the committee in rebuttal of the testimony that was given; but, as stated, under our rules, that could not be done, and the chairman of the committee very properly informed the Indian citizen that it could not be done. Nevertheless, I think that the matter which was proposed to be submitted is such a clear, definite, and dispassionate statement of Indian conditions and what is for the best interests of the Indian people that the Senate should have the benefit of it.

I therefore ask that the papers which I send to the desk, which are a letter from Mr. Rustym Rustomjee to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the reply of the chairman, and the second letter from this Indian citizen, together with the statement, may be printed in the RECORD and also as a public document. I ask that the short letters shall be printed simply because they explain the situation and indicate the official position occupied by Mr. Rustym Rustomjee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say only one word in explanation. The revolutionists of India, as the Senator calls them, applied to me for a hearing and I refused it because Mr. Rustym Rustomjee, who wished to present their case, was a native of India. I refused it under the rule, as I interpret the rule of the Senate, and we refused to hear anyone not an American citizen. Their case was presented by Mr. W. D. Malone, of course an American citizen.

Mr. Rustym Rustomjee came to me and I told him that under the rule we could only receive the communication through the President. As far as I am personally concerned, I am very glad to have it printed, but under the rule which we applied to everybody else I did not feel that we could properly present it. Under the rule Mr. Rustym Rustomjee is excluded from communicating with us, because the rule says that communications and memorials from foreign citizens can only be received through the President.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is not a memorial to the Senate, but it is a statement made by a foreign citizen, and, of course, as a mere statement and not addressed to the Senate or a petition to the Senate it could be properly printed. It is on that basis that I present it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule provides that—

No petition or memorial or other paper signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

The Senator from North Dakota, as the Chair understands it, asks unanimous consent to suspend this rule for the purpose of presenting the paper indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have objected to matters of this kind heretofore, and if we open the door to one we open it to all. Therefore I object.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, that I consider the matter as of such importance that I think I should read it at the proper time into the RECORD. Of course, if my request is refused I will take the first occasion to do that. But in many of the arguments which have been made on the Senate floor, statements by Lloyd-

George and quotations from his letters have been put into the RECORD, as were also letters and statements made by British premiers and other British subjects. I certainly can see no reason why we can not with the same propriety place in the RECORD the mere statement of a case, not directed to the Senate in any way either as a petition or a memorial, and have it printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if the Senator had the floor and was submitting remarks to the Senate I would make no objection to his presenting it as a part of his remarks.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say that early in the session, unmindful of the rule, I offered a petition here signed by citizens of a foreign country—I do not even now remember of what country—and the Chair called my attention to the rule and I withdrew it. I have had innumerable petitions and telegrams and letters from people abroad concerned in the questions raised by the treaty. I had one telegram some time ago of 10,000 words in regard to Fiume sent to me from Paris by the representative of that city there.

Since the Chair called attention to it I have withheld them all, and have replied to all that under our rules they could not be admitted. I merely mention that to indicate that the rule has been applied to me with great strictness.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is no quarrel between the Senator and myself on this subject, but possibly there is a little misunderstanding as to what the rule applies or to what it is intended to apply. If I receive a letter from a foreign subject upon any general matter pertaining to the relations between foreign nations, am I prohibited, under the rule, from presenting that and having it printed in the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule applies not only to petitions and memorials but to any paper from foreign citizens or subjects.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Chair construe "any paper" to be a paper in the nature of a petition or memorial?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair construes the rule to have been made by the Senate of the United States in order that all matters affecting the foreign relations of the Government of the United States shall first come through the President of the United States; that it was the purpose of the rule that foreign relations should not be embarrassed by placing in the RECORD petitions and memorials or any other papers signed by foreign citizens or subjects. That is the way the Chair construes the rule, and that is its purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection at all to the very liberal and comprehensive construction of the rule on the part of the Chair, because there are other methods of securing the same result. I therefore shall make no objection if that is the ruling of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done by unanimous consent, or on notice the rule may be suspended for the purpose.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only wish to say, in order to give the Senate an idea how far this matter may go and the wisdom of the rule of which I was unmindful at the beginning of the session, that I have mentioned one, merely, of the papers I have received. I recall two others that have come to me lately. One was a long and elaborate communication from Innsbruck, from the people of South Tyrol, which is handed over to Italy by the treaty with Austria. Only the other day I received a very long and elaborate paper from some Germans in Alsace, who wanted to have the question of Alsace and Lorraine brought before the Senate. I have had communications from Frenchmen, and from, I think, men of every race in Europe long and elaborate papers have come to me. I have simply replied to all that under the rule I could not present them; and I have put them away. But if we make a change in the rule, it really will involve a great deal. There are many communications I have received which I should like to have presented, but I have not been able to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not speaking with reference to the Senator from North Dakota or the document he has in mind and knows nothing about it; but the Chair desires to say that it has been a matter of daily occurrence for the Chair to receive communications and arguments and cablegrams of all characters from foreign governments during the progress of the debate on the pending treaty, and they have been invariably sent by the Chair to the Secretary of State for transmission to the President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state that I do not wish to avoid the rule in the slightest degree, but rather desire to know the limit of the rule. I intended to follow up my original request by asking that there be printed in the RECORD a statement—I think it was printed in the Daily Globe—which was published some time ago concerning the same question; but the writer of the statement, I think, is a native of India; and although it has been given publicity through a great daily paper, under the rule it can not be, as I understand the construction, introduced into the RECORD without unanimous consent; and yet it could be read by any Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is sufficient for the Chair to be compelled to rule when the question arises, but the Chair will throw out the tentative suggestion as to whether there is any difference between the presentation of a paper and the reading of it in extenso in the remarks of a Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I wish the two to go together, I shall not offer this paper at this time, but later in the day I shall take occasion to read it; and I hope the Senator from Washington will then be present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that about three years ago a western Senator, in the course of a speech which he made on the floor of the Senate, asked unanimous consent that a certain document which he held in his hand be printed as a part of his remarks and consent was given. The following day it developed that it was a paper signed by a foreigner and coming from a foreign country. The Senate immediately acted upon that case and decided that the matter should be expunged from the RECORD when the official RECORD was finally printed. I think we ought to live to the rule strictly. I do not believe that a Senator ought, as a part of his remarks, even to read a paper from a foreign citizen affecting any question.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may be allowed to say a word in reference to the statement of the Senator from Utah, it seems to me that if the Senator construes the rule so that a Senator can not, even in a speech, use a statement printed in a foreign paper by a foreign subject to elucidate what he is talking about and have it printed in the RECORD, that the rule is being carried to a nonsensical extent. Why, Mr. President, many of the quotations in some of the speeches made against the treaty have been from what some British subject said on the subject, or what some one else—the Canadian premier, for instance—claims would be the construction of the treaty, and so forth. Does the Senator mean to say that those who agree with him on certain features of the treaty have been grossly out of order in quoting the statements made by foreign officials upon this subject?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Utah does not mean to say that, but all the quotations I have heard made by any Senator are from what has been reported as the statement of so-and-so, but the whole document, as I understand, has not been introduced into the RECORD, although it is true there have been quotations made on the floor of the Senate as coming from foreign representatives.

I do not know what the letter the Senator has contains, but the question is this: If we undertake to allow all petitions and papers from foreign countries sent to Senators to be placed in the RECORD, they will not only fill the RECORD but will involve a violation of the rule always respected in the past.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This must be the clear distinction, that such communications can not come as papers to the Senate of the United States unless they come through the President or through the setting aside of the rule, but a Senator addressing the Senate may use them in his arguments not as papers that come to the Senate but as fortifying the argument he is making.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am somewhat astonished at the view of the Senator from Utah that a Senator can read in an address what purports to be the statement of some foreign subject but can not read the real address, which is absolutely authenticated by the signature of the person making it.

LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, on two occasions there have been presented under the head of petitions letters written by the League to Enforce Peace directed to "dear fellow covenanter," and so forth, requesting financial assistance. I assume that it is well known throughout the United States that there is a society which was in existence even before the World War, and whose object was to secure an agreement between the nations of the earth to maintain the peace of the world. Like all organizations this one must have financial assistance, the same as the Republican organization and the Democratic organization. I see nothing criminal at all in the request for this financial assistance. There is another organization in the United States whose purpose is to prevent there being any understanding between the nations of the world to prevent wars. I have had the circulars from that organization, and I recall distinctly one which called upon me for such subscription as I might see fit to give in that great cause and reciting that this society purposed to have an organization in every voting precinct in the United States to prevent the adoption of the league of nations. I do not think it is at all improper for either organization to secure funds to maintain its principles any more than it is for either political organization to do the same thing; and my purpose in rising was to say that the greatest organization in the United States, outside of the two great political organizations, and whose purpose is to oppose any league of nations, is doing the same thing that the League to Enforce Peace is charged with. If both are sincere in their convictions, then both are justified in seeking assistance to bring their views before the public.

NEUTRALIZATION OF TRANSPORTATION IN CHINA.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the senior Senator from Massachusetts if he has had any answer from the Secretary of State in response to the resolution which was submitted on September 11, dealing with a report of Mr. Paul Whitham on the neutralization of transportation in China.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offered a Senate resolution, which was adopted, requesting the Secretary of State to forward to the Senate the report of Mr. Paul Whitham on the railroad systems of China. I have received no answer whatever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would come to the Senate, would it not?

Mr. LODGE. It was a resolution of the Senate. Yes; it would come to the Senate. I say I have received none. I think, if an answer were received, my attention would be called to it, as it usually is in the case of the introducer of a resolution. That is the practice. I have heard nothing of it. Of course, the Vice President suggests the possibility that it has been received and lost in the Secretary's office, but that is a supposition which I decline to accept.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Vice President suggested the idea that a resolution of the Senate would call for an answer to the Senate and not to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it would; the Chair is entirely right, but it has not been received. I think I may say that with assurance. Hitherto, during all the time I have been in the Senate, it has been customary at least to acknowledge these resolutions. If it would take time to respond, that was usually stated. In the very rare cases where information was refused by direction of the President, that was stated. Under this administration the practice has grown up of paying no attention whatever to them, as anyone will find who will take the trouble to look over the history of the resolutions of inquiry in regard to Mexico offered by many Senators since the beginning of the Mexican trouble. I have been told, though I have not counted them myself, that there are 262, and I think only one has been answered. They go to the departments or to the President, and no notice at all is taken of them. If there is an objection to sending in the information asked for, that is not stated. Nothing is stated. They are simply pocketed, and no attention is paid to them. That is a new system—I dare say a very good one, but it is new.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts states the ordinary course of the departments as now constituted; but some of them do acknowledge the receipt of communications, and the Chair has handed down the acknowledgment of receipt of communications. The Senator states accurately, however, that ordinarily you get nothing until you get the answer.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to say that my remark in regard to failure to answer applies to all departments. There are many departments that answer, as they always have. If they require time to furnish the information, they acknowledge the receipt of the resolution and state the fact; or if the report can not be given, they state that, but they acknowledge it. What I had in mind were the inquiries chiefly in regard to foreign relations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, perhaps the business of the State Department is conducted privy from the Secretary of State, like that of the delegation in Paris.

LABOR STRIKES.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take a little of the time of the Senate to present some views that I have on a subject that I consider of considerable importance, so much so that I have written down what I have to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the Senator proceeding in the morning hour? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I have been a Member of this body for such a short time I feel a delicacy in saying anything on any subject. However, in these troublesome times if I were to remain silent when it is my duty to speak I feel that I would be very derelict in performing my duty, not only to the people of South Carolina but to the entire country.

I noticed in the Washington Post of a day or two since where one John Fitzpatrick, a high official in the American Federation of Labor, said that in calling the steel strike he felt that he was representing this Government. I do not arrogate to myself authority to speak for this Government, but I do say that so far as my interest in it is concerned when he called said strike he did not represent my part of the Government. I repudiate any effort on the part of anyone to entangle this Government on the side of either capital or labor in private disputes. I am a friend of both capital and labor. To drive out the one or to oppress the other would be equally suicidal to the future prosperity of this country. I believe that capital should be encouraged to invest and to develop the resources of our Nation, and thereby give employment to our people, and that it should be allowed a fair and just return for its use. At the same time labor should be treated equitably, humanely, and liberally.

The phrase "a living wage" never appealed to me. Men work not only to live, but to accumulate, to better their condition, to be enabled to educate their children and to buy homes and to lay up something for support in old age. I have no objection to labor combining in a proper way to better its condition. If one desires to join the union and if the union is willing to admit him, I see no objection. On the other hand, if labor prefers to remain out of the union, they should be permitted to pursue whatever line of work they desire and should not be molested or harassed. At the same time I am strongly opposed to lockouts and strikes in Government positions or in operating public utilities. If any differences exist between employer and employee, they should get together and mutually talk over their troubles, or their imaginary troubles, and should settle their differences among themselves. If this should be found impossible, then there should be some way of compulsory arbitration in the occupations above mentioned or a reasonable notice to quit should be required. I have no objection to labor asking whatever it desires for its services, and if it and its employer can agree, well and good, but if not, they should be slow to strike, but should consider the injury and suffering of the toiling millions who have no relief and who had nothing to do with the cause of the trouble. I know of no law to compel any particular individual to work for any employer or at any particular occupation. When they can not agree, the remedy should be to quietly quit and to pursue some other vocation or occupation in life.

I am sorry for the man who says that he is only qualified to fill one position. When labor says it will not work for its former employer because they can not agree, and when it goes further and combines and announces that no one else shall work for said employer, and if it should go so far as to forget itself and destroy life or property, it should be held strictly responsible under the penalties of the law for whatever wrongdoing it may commit. And at that time the law should step in with its strong arm and suppress any disorder. Such protection is what people pay taxes for. I am no more interested in one class than in the other. My opinion is that the profits of each have about reached the peak, and that it is now high time to consider the interests of those who bear the burdens and pay the bills—the public.

In this country we have a constitutional form of government and laws to redress all wrongs, and when these are upturned anarchy will prevail. Without intending in the least to criticize my colleagues, I am thoroughly convinced that Congress is taking cognizance of too many quarrels between different groups of citizens. We are continually having hearings, spending money, and consuming time, and, to my mind, very little good has been accomplished. If the parties to these controversies knew that they would not get the ear of Congress, they would get together and settle their own grievances more rapidly and there would be less unrest and turmoil. I fear that we are allowing our body to fast become the clearing house for the scandals of the Nation and are affording free advertising to much muckraking that should not be heralded abroad. We are elected directly by the people, and we know, or at least should know, what is best for them, and should legislate on national subjects in a broad and comprehensive way. If the pace we have been setting in the recent past is continued—taking notice of all items from school-teachers' pay to the league of nations and peace treaty—it will not be long before husbands and wives will bring their differences for us to settle. We should remember that the several States still have rights, and they should cope with them and settle all intrastate questions, and that we should not undertake to investigate matters unless they are of a peculiarly national character and unless we have a constitutional right to apply a remedy. It is high time to lay aside all unnecessary restrictions and let the public act normally again. It is a function of government to tax, regulate, and supervise but not to engage in business. The Government should get out of all business it can at the earliest minute and allow its citizens to pursue their usual course in a natural and legitimate way, otherwise we will grow up a nation of dependents instead of an independent population.

SHORTAGE OF SUGAR.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 197), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Commerce is hereby instructed to investigate the shortage of sugar and the prices of sugar in the United States, and that the Sugar Equalization Board is respectfully requested to cooperate with the Senate Committee on Commerce in this investigation.

Resolved further, That the Senate Committee on Commerce is directed to report to the Senate at the earliest possible time its conclusions, especially on the following:

(a) The reasons for the shortage of sugar.

(b) Information regarding the prices of sugar, and whether any unjust or exorbitant profits have been made on sugar; and if so, by whom.

(c) The prospects for relief from the sugar shortage.

(d) Fixing the responsibility for the shortage of sugar.

(e) Advice as to whether legislation to prevent speculation in sugar is desirable.

(f) Whether the Sugar Equalization Board should be continued within its present capacity.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it will be observed that the resolution as drawn is referred to the Committee on Commerce. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce suggests that he thinks the reference should be to the Committee on Interstate Commerce instead, or possibly to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. On reflection I am inclined to think that the reference should be to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I ask unanimous consent to have the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry named in place of the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to modify his resolution, and it will be so modified.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, with reference to this matter, certainly the condition of the sugar supply in this country is a matter of immediate personal interest to the head of every family and every consumer. I am led to believe, by information which comes to me from very reliable sources, that the danger of a sugar famine next year is as great as was the danger of a like famine last year, or greater.

The Sugar Equalization Board, authorized by the President, bought the entire Cuban crop of raw sugars for 1919 and made contracts with the refiners to sell them their entire allotment of sugar with the understanding that the refined should be sold to the wholesale trade at 9 cents less 2 per cent f. o. b. refinery. The Sugar Equalization Board also controlled the beet crop of 1918, but had no control over the 1919 crop of beet sugar in this country.

In October, 1918, the Sugar Equalization Board allotted to the British Royal Commission, who are the authorized buyers for England, France, and Italy, one-third of the raw sugar of Cuba, which at that time was decided as a fair distribution of the Cuban crop for ourselves and our allies. Owing to the heavy demand in this country a sugar shortage developed in June of this year, and all export orders were stopped on July 1 except the British Royal Commission's share of the Cuban crop, which is being refined in this country on toll and shipped abroad. Early in August the Sugar Equalization Board called to the attention of the President the critical situation confronting the consumer of sugar and advised at that time that the Sugar Equalization Board control be extended to cover the beet-sugar crop of 1919 and the Cuban cane crop of 1920 in order to provide an equitable distribution and price control, and prevent speculation in sugars, which would naturally prevail on a short supply. On September 1 the Equalization Board could have made contracts with the beet-sugar refiners to sell their entire crop at 10 cents per pound; also with the Cuban planters on the same basis, making refined sugar 10 cents seaboard, instead of 9 cents, for this year's crop.

It is the belief and the charge of many of those who have been officially connected with the control and distribution of the sugar supply that owing to the Executive's failure to act and extend this control beet sugar refiners are asking 11½ cents for beet sugar to-day f. o. b. refinery, and the stock of raw sugar will be exhausted in four weeks, and refiners will be out of sugar in November and December, resulting in a serious shortage and sugar famine for the entire eastern half of the country. In the meantime foreign buyers have contracted for 25 per cent of the Cuban crop for 1920, and our refiners in this country have not contracted for a single pound, awaiting the President's decision as to a further control, and unless immediate action is taken in this matter foreign buyers will buy 50 per cent of the Cuban crop, which will result in a sugar famine and extreme shortage in this country all of next year, which will result in high prices and cause speculation.

The board's opinion is that sugar should be rationed immediately, and all distribution and prices be under their control until conditions are normal again in the production and distribution of sugar. The failure of the President to act on the board's suggestion has already resulted in a cent and one-half advance above the price offered the Sugar Equalization Board on September 1, and without control the refiners will not make contracts for future delivery, which will result in 15-cent sugar wholesale and probably 20 cents to the consumer.

When the present crop of raws is refined from Cuba the Sugar Equalization Board's duty is over, and the manufacture and distribution of sugar will depend entirely upon the refiners and wholesalers, who will have to obtain their supplies as best they can without any Government assistance. It is the belief of the board that the present emergency will result seriously in obtaining sufficient supply for the consumer unless this Government control is extended and supervised for another year, and will result in 20 cents a pound for sugar to the consumer and with only 50 per cent of the requirements available.

In addition, we are faced with a shortage of the sugar-beet crop in California of 40 per cent, and it is further urged that the Cuban and Porto Rican crops should be controlled by Government purchase and distribution to prevent any undue proportioning to European countries and to prevent sugar falling into the hands of speculators.

If it is true that the Sugar Equalization Board has several times requested the President to give his attention to this subject, the country ought to know it, and if it is a misstatement of the fact the President ought to have an opportunity to say so to the country. At all events I think we realize that the subject is most important, and the country ought to have the truth wihout delay. If the President is not responsible for neglecting this question he should be given the opportunity to say so.

Mr. President, I think this is a matter of great and immediate importance to the country, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SENATE ROLL CALLS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I give notice of a proposed amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate, and ask that the Secretary may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I give notice of a proposed amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate, as follows: Amend Rule XII by adding to the end thereof the following paragraph:

"4. When the roll is called, either for the purpose of taking the yeas and nays or for ascertaining the presence of a quorum, the result shall not be announced by the presiding officer until at least 15 minutes shall have elapsed after the beginning of the calling of the roll, and every Senator who answers to his name within that time shall have the right to be recorded."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may be allowed the courtesy of a minute to explain briefly the purpose of the proposed amendment to the rules, I will do so.

Senators are not on the floor of the Chamber all the time, and it has come within my experience half a dozen times within the last month or two, while sitting in my office in the Senate Office Building, that the bell would ring, indicating either a call for a quorum or a vote. I have immediately left the office and attempted to get the elevator in the Office Building, the trolley car, and then the other elevator in this building, to reach the floor of the Senate, and in four or five instances, and in the last instance, in company with six other Senators, in the exercise of due diligence, I arrived as the Secretary was handing the result of the roll call to the Chair, and just in time to be recorded. In the other instances I failed to get here in time.

I do not know that the proposed amendment I have submitted will cover the situation, and it is merely designed to bring the subject to the attention of the Committee on Rules so that Senators who may be engaged in their offices may not lose an opportunity to vote, perhaps upon a critical occasion. It seems to me, inasmuch as the Senate Office Building has been located at the distance from the Senate Chamber at which it is located, a Senator is fairly entitled, if he is in the exercise of due care and haste upon his own part, to have time enough to get here after he is notified that the roll is going to be called, and to put his name upon the roll. That is the sole purpose of the resolution.

I make no intimation that the situation is due at all to the procedure of the secretaries or clerks at the desk. It is impossible for the Secretary to tell, in the calling of the roll, how rapidly to call it in order to keep pace with the rapidity with which the elevators and trolley cars move between this Chamber and the Senate Office Building. They move at different rates of speed at different times, according to the emergency.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he has made an estimate of the usual time required for calling the roll. I understand it requires about five minutes to go over the names in the first instance, and if other Senators come in the roll is gone over again, and in the neighborhood of eight minutes is required. That would be about half the time that is suggested in this proposed amendment to the rules. What would the Senate be doing during the balance of the time? Does the Senator contemplate that the calling of the roll shall in all instances require 15 minutes before anything further is done?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; I do not contemplate that the time consumed shall be entirely devoted to the calling of the roll. I do contemplate that some period of time ought to be fixed, so that a Senator may know how fast he will have to move in order to get here. Each Senator can time himself. Yesterday I asked my secretary to leave my office and time himself, taking the elevators and the trolley car, from the time he left the office to the time when he got on the floor of the Senate. He did it very accurately, timing himself by his watch, and it took him four and one-half minutes to get here, because he got both elevators and the trolley car very promptly. Coming back, however, he did not have such good luck, and it took seven and one-half or eight minutes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume if the ordinary time for calling of the roll is 10 minutes, the crack of doom would not impend if we sat here in silence for two or three minutes, as I have done many a time waiting for a quorum. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that it might be possible to secure the reform which he desires by adopting the practice of the House of Representatives. There the roll is called, and after it has been called it is called the second time for the absentees. That makes a definite arrangement by which it may be ascertained whether it is possible for absentees to be brought into the Chamber.

I think the difficulty of naming a certain time would be that the Senate would sit here with nothing to do and great difficulty would be found in limiting it by time; but if the Senator would change his proposed amendment so as to provide that after the roll is called for a vote it shall be called the second time so far as absentees are concerned we would have a definite and rather accurate way of giving absentees close at hand an opportunity to vote. I merely make that suggestion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state that my suggestion is merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on Rules to the evil, if I may call it that, for which a correction is sought. Every sort of proposition will be presented to the committee, and they will consider the whole situation and report what in their judgment is the proper remedy. I do not know what it will be. I had to suggest something to bring it before the committee for their consideration.

Mr. KNOX. The members of the Committee on Rules have at various times discussed this matter. Of course every Senator is anxious to be recorded when there is a roll call, I think, unless something——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not always.

Mr. THOMAS. No; not always.

Mr. KNOX. I was just going to qualify that by stating unless there was something pressing that induced him to vary from that position. One of the remedies that has been suggested in the committee was that the time be noted when the roll call begins—for instance, a roll call might begin now at 4 minutes past 1 o'clock—and then it could be provided that any time within 10 minutes from the beginning of the roll call any Senator not in the Chamber when his name was called would have the privilege of reporting to the Secretary and having his presence noted. That would not interfere with the business of the Senate at all, for the Senate would proceed with its business after the roll call had been finished.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In many cases when the roll is called, until the result is announced the Senate is in doubt as to what it is going to do. For instance, it may be a roll call on taking up a certain measure, and in that case the Senate would have no means of knowing whether the measure would be taken up or not, whereas if the roll is called in the first place and a number of absentees are discovered, and it is called then so far as the absentees are concerned, the Senate will be proceeding with some action until the absentees are given an opportunity to come in, but in many cases the roll call must be acted upon at once one way or the other.

Mr. KNOX. I see the point the Senator makes. I was only stating this as one of the various things that had been suggested, but I do think there ought to be some provision made so that Senators who have offices only in the Senate Office Building may have an opportunity to be recorded on a roll call.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The rule which prevails in the House of Representatives apparently works satisfactorily.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator think that would cover a sufficient length of time to enable a Senator to get to the Chamber?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I believe it would.

Mr. KNOX. It does in the House, I understand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It takes three-quarters of an hour to call the roll in the House.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have forgotten exactly when it was, but I think possibly in the Sixty-third Congress, that the Senate adopted a rule which provided that after a roll call had been had a roll call of the absentees should also be had. We worked under that rule, I think, for two or three months and abrogated it because it consumed a vast deal of time, but it was a splendid rule. It afforded every Senator an opportunity to be here and have his vote recorded.

Mr. KNOX. That is substantially the rule suggested by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ASHURST. Absolutely. I remember we had the rule for at least three or four months, and it was abrogated; why, I do not know.

Mr. KNOX. How long ago was that?

Mr. ASHURST. I should say it was at the end of the Sixty-third Congress. The rule was adopted some time in the latter part of 1913 or the early part of 1914. We worked under the rule for, I should say, three months. It worked admirably and gave every Senator an opportunity to get from the Senate Office Building to the Senate Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the only time the roll is called the second time since I have been a Member of the body is when the first roll call does not show that a quorum is present.

Mr. ASHURST. I am trusting to my memory only, but I am very sure we did have such a rule providing that when the roll call was concluded, the roll of the absentees should then be called.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will find that referred only to the matter of a quorum and not to a vote.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in the House of Representatives they have the previous question. If there is a roll call and a filibuster is precipitated, it can be handled very promptly and quickly by the Committee on Rules by moving the previous question. For the last 10 years the Senate has been doing everything it could to increase delay and prevent action. If the resolution proposed by the Senator from Connecticut were adopted, fixing 15 minutes for each roll call, there would be 4 roll calls an hour or 20 a day, and the Senate could consume all that time in roll calls, thus preventing the transaction of business. We had been able to get unanimous consent for a final vote promptly, but three years ago we passed a resolution providing that that can be done only when we have a quorum present. All measures of that sort have lessened the chance to facilitate action on the part of the Senate, and what we need more than anything else is a rule to facilitate action and not rules to delay action. It seems to me that for the last 8 or 10 years we have been adding to the rules and adding to the rules so that there is no possibility of having the previous question moved on a matter of any consequence. It has delayed the possibility of the Senate getting any action. That condition does not exist in the House of Representatives, because they can move the previous question at any time or get a report from the Committee on Rules.

I am satisfied that if the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut is adopted, at any time when there is anything pending before the Senate, as we could only have four roll calls an hour, the five hours of the afternoon devoted to roll calls would consume the entire business day of the Senate.

We had here for a while, I think for two months, whether under a rule or not, the practice of calling the names of the absentees. If I mistake not the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] or the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had that adopted temporarily. I know it was done for a short while, but it was seen that it occasioned delay and it was abandoned. If there is any amendment to the rules that I want, it is an amendment to facilitate business and have action and not delay, not to have the Senate wait until Senators can sit in their rooms up town and then make it easy for them to come here and vote, and have the rest of the Senate delayed until they can make their appearance.

EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, yesterday I reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes." It was a unanimous report, but I neglected to put into the RECORD the proper report, and I want to take just a moment for that purpose.

The proposed Senate joint resolution 88 was directed to be amended by the Senate committee by striking out paragraph 3, on page 2, relating to the buying of bonds, but otherwise it proposed to modify the authority of the War Finance Corporation act of April 5, 1918. The powers of the War Finance Corporation are shown in sections 7, 8, and 9, which, without reading, I insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The sections referred to are as follows:

SEC. 7. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances, upon such terms and not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances:

(1) To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which shall have made, after April 6, 1917, and which shall have outstanding, any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business in the United States, whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and evidenced by a note or notes, but no such advance shall exceed 75 per cent of the face value of such loan or loans; and

(2) To any bank, banker, or trust company in the United States which shall have rendered financial assistance, directly or indirectly, to any such person, firm, corporation, or association by the purchase after April 6, 1917, of its bonds or other obligations, but no such advance shall exceed 75 per cent of the value of such bonds or other obligations at the time of such advance, as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation.

All advances shall be made upon the promissory note or notes of such bank, banker, or trust company, secured by the notes, bonds, or other obligations which are the basis of any such advance by the corporation, together with all the securities, if any, which such bank, banker, or trust company may hold as collateral for such notes, bonds, or other obligations.

The corporation shall, however, have power to make advances (a) up to 100 per cent of the face value of any such loan made by any such bank, banker, or trust company to any such person, firm, corporation, or association, and (b) up to 100 per cent of the value at the time of any such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation) of such bonds or other obligations by the purchase of which financial assistance shall have been rendered to such person, firm, corporation, or association: Provided, That every such advance shall be secured in the manner described in the preceding part of this section, and in addition thereto by collateral security, to be furnished by the bank, banker, or trust company, of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors, of a value, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation), equal to at least 33 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time.

SEC. 8. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances from time to time, upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding one year, to any savings bank, banking institution, or trust company in the United States which receives savings deposits, or to any building and loan association in the United States, on the promissory note or notes of the borrowing institution whenever the corporation shall deem such advances to be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war or important in the public interest: Provided, That such note or notes shall be secured by the pledge of securities of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, the value of which, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation), shall be equal in amount to at least 133 per cent of the amount of such advance. The rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrowing institution is located, but such rate of interest shall in no case be greater than the average rate receivable by the borrowing institution on its loans and investments made during the six months prior to the date of the advance, except that where the average rate so receivable by the borrowing institution is less than such rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper the rate of interest on such advance shall be equal to such rate of discount. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time.

SEC. 9. That the corporation shall be empowered and authorized in exceptional cases to make advances directly to any person, firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business in the United States whose operation shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war (but only for the purpose of conducting such business in the United States and only when in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation such person, firm, corporation, or association is unable to obtain funds upon reasonable terms through banking channels or from the general public), for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation. In no case shall the aggregate amount of the advances made under this section exceed at any one time an amount equal to 12½ per cent of the sum of (1) the authorized capital stock of the corporation plus (2) the aggregate amount of bonds of the corporation authorized to be outstanding at any one time when the capital stock is fully paid in. Every such advance shall be secured by adequate security of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of a value at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors) equal to (except in case of an advance made to a railroad in the possession and control of the President, for the purpose of making additions, betterments, or road extensions to such railroad) at least 125 per cent of the amount advanced by the corporation. The corporation shall retain power to require additional security at any time. The rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrower is located.

Mr. OWEN. This joint resolution gives some additional powers, extending the time from 5 to 10 years for operation of the powers of that organization, and it is extended so as to permit them to give assistance to foreign exports.

The country has got into a condition where the foreign exchanges, because of our excess commodity shipments, are very much disorganized, and to such an extent as to make it almost impossible for the people of Europe to buy our goods, the exchange of Italy being nearly two for one, the French and Belgian exchange being almost as much, and the exchange with Great Britain being very adverse to Great Britain. So those people are deterred from buying our American goods, such as we find valuable to export.

For that reason the joint resolution was drawn up by the Treasury Department, and it comes with the unanimous report of the committee. Gov. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, was present before the committee yesterday and explained that it met the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. There is no objection to it in any quarter that I know of. It really is a matter of great urgency and ought to be disposed of. If there is no objection to its disposition I shall be very glad to have it disposed of.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I do not know that I have any objection to the joint resolution, but as the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry were considering the food control bill and the rent bill, it was impossible for me to be present when this measure was considered. For that reason I should like to have it go over to give me an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. OWEN. I am leaving the city for a few days. However, I will say to the Senator that I will not press it, but will leave it merely to the committee members themselves to dispose of it as they see fit. I have done what I could with regard to it. The chairman requested me to present it to the Senate and to submit the report.

I should like to put in the RECORD a statement as to the policy pursued by Great Britain in the Finnish loan of 1916—£6,000,000—under license of the treasury of Great Britain by the British Bank for Foreign Trade (Ltd.), in which they explain the manner in which these advances functioned in supporting the commerce both of Great Britain and of Finland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"THE FINNISH LOAN, 1919, £6,000,000.

"THE DUTY OF CAPITAL.

"On all sides there is the cry that if we do not restore our export trade we shall become a bankrupt nation. Increase production, work hard, curtail nonproductive work—all these excellent exhortations are being urged throughout the country in the effort to cure the lethargy and extravagance that have followed the cessation of hostilities. Gradually these precepts are being driven home in the directions in which they are most needed and the fallacies of limitation of hours and output are being exposed.

"That is all to the good. But in the great task that lies ahead of us—the task of saving the nation from a course that leads to bankruptcy and ruin—capital has its duty no less than hands and brains. That there is capital available in this country is only too obvious. Enormous sums are being spent on the purchase of large estates, pictures and curios, jewelry and precious stones, expensive furniture, and other luxuries. There are people who will tell you that they prefer at such a time as this to spend their money on tangible things at home rather than to put it beyond their control by investing it. They will wait to see how the land lies. But this way lies national bankruptcy.

"TRADE FOLLOWS CAPITAL.

"It was by the employment of British capital to finance British trade abroad that British trade was built up and became preeminent. If British capital becomes insular and short-sighted, then not only shall we fail to regain our preeminence but we shall inevitably be involved in disaster, because our oversea commerce is vital to our national existence. Unemployment, widespread poverty, economic ruin, social and political chaos—these would be a heavy price to pay for the temporary enjoyment of the luxury and ease on which money is now being lavished.

"How, then, can capital be most usefully and profitably employed to help our oversea trade? It is often overlooked that even before the war Europe was the biggest customer for British goods. Our exports to North and South America, important and valuable as they were, did not amount to so much as those to Europe. We sold more to Germany than to the United States, more to France than to the Argentine, more to Russia than to Brazil and Chile together. Now that the United States, with the enormous advantage that the war has given her, has embarked so energetically upon a great export trade, it is unlikely that this preponderance of Europe among our customers will be diminished. On the contrary, it may easily happen that we shall have to concentrate still more on the markets nearest home.

"WHERE BRITISH GOODS ARE MOST NEEDED.

"At the moment there is no doubt where our goods are most needed. The war-stricken countries of Europe, and the new States that before the war relied on Germany for the bulk of their imports, are crying out for our goods. But they have no means of paying for them. They have plenty of depreciated currency and plenty of produce that they could send us in return for our goods. But British manufacturers and exporters need to be paid in sterling, not in depreciated currency nor in foreign produce. This is where, in normal times, the exchange dealer comes in. But the exchange dealer only deals in a certain kind of credit. He does not create credit. If, say, Poland has no credit, either direct or indirect, available here, the exchange merchant can not sell sterling here in exchange for currency in Poland, however high the rate he is offered.

"In normal circumstances there would be sterling credits arising from Polish goods imported by us, and these credits could be employed in paying for British goods exported to Poland. But all this machinery has been upset by the war, and the credits do not exist here. This is where capital can come to the rescue. Capital can supply the necessary credit for the benefit of the impoverished countries.

"BEST MARKET FOR THE POUND STERLING.

"We hear a great deal of lamentation over the depreciation of the pound sterling, and, generally speaking, it is all too true. But all values, and especially exchange values, are relative. At home the pound sterling is undoubtedly depreciated, in so far as it purchases a much-reduced quantity of commodities. And in terms of United States currency it is greatly depreciated, in so far as the sterling exchange rate is extremely low. But in terms of most European currencies the pound sterling stands at a premium, and in terms of some of them at a premium far outstripping its discount across the Atlantic. It is a most elementary rule of successful trading to sell one's goods and services in the best market. The pound sterling is no exception to the rule.

"But what of supporting the foreign exchanges that are against us? Sterling exchange in the United States is very low, and since we import certain essential foodstuffs from America, and, moreover, owe America large sums for war debt and interest, this low exchange is a serious disadvantage to us. Is it not primarily necessary, it may be asked, to increase our exports to America, so as to support the exchange there?

"TRADE EQUIPOISE THE FIRST ESSENTIAL.

"But foreign exchange and finance are cosmopolitan. They do not work in water-tight compartments. We must, first of all, see to it that the value of our exports and our services to other nations is sufficient to balance the value of the imports and services of other nations to ourselves. We can do that most expeditiously by trading in the most favorable market. When that eminently desirable equipoise is reached the exchanges, so far as this country is concerned, will right themselves either by arbitrage operations in exchange or by the transfer of investments. Until that equipoise is reached our financial machinery is out of gear and we can not allow it free play. We can not have a free gold market. We can not resume our position as the world's monetary center. It is essential to restore our trade balance as quickly as we can.

"THE 'EXPORT OF CAPITAL' FALLACY.

"It is necessary, too, to correct certain fallacious ideas as to what is called the export of capital. Taking their lead from the policy that was adopted by the Government under war conditions, there are people who still hold that while capital is so badly needed at home—to reconstruct factories for peaceful operations, to fund the Nation's floating debt, to build houses for the people—it is folly to send capital abroad, to lend it to foreigners, until we have provided for home needs. This argument overlooks the whole basis not merely of our national prosperity but of our national existence; that is, our dependence on supplies from abroad.

"No amount of capital spent at home, no rearrangement of the national debt, no improvement in the social condition of the workers, will by itself bring us the timber we need to build houses, the wheat for our food, the cotton for our clothes.

"To secure these we must export other things in return. If, because of the impoverishment of prospective customers and the breakdown of the international trade machinery, these customers have no immediate means of paying for our exports, we must lend them the money to enable them to do so. It does not mean exporting wealth, nor even exporting the money that represents it. The money remains here at the credit of our customers, to be used by them to pay our manufacturers and exporters for the goods they send abroad.

"OUR FUNCTION IN WORLD TRADE.

"This financing of foreign nations is a valuable part of the service that the United Kingdom has in the past rendered to international trade. It oils the wheels of the machinery by which our foreign trade is set in motion and kept going. It receives its direct reward in the annual interest—paid in the form of imports of merchandise from abroad—and it brings a far richer and cumulative reward in the reciprocal trade that it engenders.

"Capital employed at home can only bring prosperity in so far as it increases our power of usefulness to the world abroad, either in the production of the merchandise that the world needs or in other services, such as shipping, technical and financial assistance, and commercial organization. We can not get what we need from abroad without giving of these in return. And foreign trade will not wait while we concentrate our energies on home affairs. Already powerful competitors, not disorganized as we have been by the war, are grasping all the trade they can in both hemispheres. We must get our oversea commerce going or we shall lose not merely prosperity and comfort but the means of livelihood itself. That is why the Government is relaxing its restrictions on what is loosely called the export of capital—on the issue of foreign loans in this country.

"FINLAND AS A FIELD FOR BRITISH TRADE.

"Foremost among such loans is that being arranged for the Republic of Finland. Under its new independence, Finland has the makings of a valuable field for British trade. Its civilization and education are already well developed and its industries are capable of great expansion. It has produce that we need and it urgently needs goods that we can supply.

"In the year before the war, Finland's imports from Germany amounted to 202,000,000 marks (the Finnish mark being equivalent to the French franc), while those from the United Kingdom amounted to only 60,000,000 marks.

"Chief among its imports were foodstuffs supplied almost entirely by Germany and Russia. We can not hope to secure that trade. But there is ample scope in other articles. Of 27,000,000 marks of material for the Finnish spinning industries, nearly a half came from Germany in 1913 and only a third from us. Textile imports amounted to 26,000,000 marks, of which we supplied little more than one-sixth, Germany and Russia between them sending the great bulk. Of 33,000,000 marks of machinery and motors, Germany furnished nearly a half, while we provided less than a sixth. And throughout the list of Finland's imports there is the same tale of fields to be conquered by British manufacturers.

"And in return Finland can send us much that we urgently need. Her great forests can furnish us with abundant supplies of timber and her industries with wood pulp and paper and with wooden goods. We can have her butter and other farm produce if we will send her our goods in return. But she must have our goods, not only as payment but also to feed her own industries, which depend very largely on imports of raw material which before the war were received mainly from Germany.

"Sanction has been given by His Majesty's treasury to the issue in this country of a loan to Finland on the understanding that the proceeds will be expended in the purchase of goods in the United Kingdom. That is actually the object of the loan—to enable the Finnish Government and the State Bank of Finland to finance the purchase of British goods. It is a loan to get trade going between the United Kingdom and Finland for the mutual benefit of both countries. As this trade develops it will be financed by the ordinary mercantile and banking machinery, and the loan will gradually be repaid. Provision has, in fact, been made for the gradual liquidation of the loan within a certain period by half-yearly installments. It is essentially a loan for trade. It is not a loan to pay for works that may or may not prove productive, but a loan to finance British trade and to be liquidated out of the benefits that Finland will derive from that trade.

"The actual process will be that the proceeds of the loan will be spent in this country in the purchase of forestry and agricultural machinery and tools, in cotton and woolen yarns and cloth, in soap and numerous other articles of household necessity manufactured in this country, and so on. These will be shipped to Finland and sold for Finnish marks, providing the industrious Finnish workman with the tools of his trade and the necessaries and comforts of life. The Finnish marks so obtained will be spent in Finland on the purchase of timber, dairy produce, and all those raw materials for which the British public has at present to pay such an exorbitant price, but which Finland and the countries beyond Finland produce. These are lying in great abundance in Finland, but can not be moved because of the lack of finance. They will be shipped to Great Britain and the proceeds banked here, so reestablishing the Finnish credit. This process will be continued again and again, each time with profit for banker, merchant, manufacturer, and workman in both Great Britain and Finland and the general community of both countries will benefit by being able to purchase at reasonable cost those articles the other is best able to produce. This is the manner in which trade follows capital."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I very hurriedly read over the statement which the Senator handed me, but I observe from reading the statement that Great Britain is making a loan of many million dollars to the new Government of Finland. I was wondering why it is impossible for corporations of the United States to make similar loans to foreign countries if desirable. As I understand it, it is by no means through any special legislation that these loans are made by Great Britain. It was simply undertaken by the financial men and corporations of that country, and why it is necessary to enact special laws for America any more than it is for any other country I am at a loss to understand. I wish the Senator would comment upon that.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think there is any difference in the policy. The policy is the same. This Finnish loan, for instance, is being offered by the British Bank of Foreign Trade, and they function precisely the same as the War Finance Corporation will if this amendment of the act of April 5, 1918, should go through.

Mr. GRONNA. Am I correct in assuming that this transaction is a commercial transaction between the British bank and the country of Finland, or is it a governmental function?

Mr. OWEN. It is under a special license of the treasury department; and in that sense it is governmental. This foreign trade bank was expressly organized in order to finance just such transactions. In reality it amounts to this: That the advances which are made under the authority of the British Bank of Foreign Trade are used for the buying of British commodities, and the credits are confined to the purpose of buying British commodities. Then when the British commodities go to Finland and are taken up there, the Finnish goods, in the same way, are shipped back finally to pay for the British goods. This is merely a medium of exchange between the two.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will further yield, I desire to say that, as a matter of fact, as I understand, it has nothing whatever to do with regulating the exchange.

Mr. OWEN. It has this to do with it, that the exchange is upset because of the excess commodities from the United States going abroad without being adequately financed here. Unless credits are sufficient then these bills appear in excess in our own banks; and appearing excess the banks take advantage of that, of course, by refusing to pay any more for them than they have to pay. It is just like any other commodity; if a large number of the bills are offered, more than there is credit available for, they go begging for purchasers.

Mr. GRONNA. I can readily understand that if Great Britain loans to Finland £6,000,000 it will stabilize the currency and the credit of Finland and will increase its value.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that I do not think it has anything to do with the currency of Finland. The only object is to give the credit of Great Britain to Finnish merchants who are buying British goods, and the credits are confined to those purchases.

Mr. GRONNA. It extends credit to Finland, which, of course, increases the value of Finnish money and decreases in an indirect manner the exchange. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. It extends credit to Finnish merchants to buy the goods from England.

Mr. OWEN. Otherwise they could not buy. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GRONNA. That is my understanding; but the legislation which we have had before us has principally been, as I understand, to try to make a Finnish mark worth something more than it really is—that is, that has been the argument—to try to make the lira, for example, now worth only a few cents, worth double that amount.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that so far as that is concerned, taking the lira as an example, Premier Nitti is putting out now a forced loan at 2½ per cent in the form of bonds, which is in effect a tax; and with the proceeds of that forced loan at 2½ per cent it is proposed to take up their inflated currency, which is the only proper way to bring it back upon a gold basis. I assume that the other nations will do the the same thing; they will be compelled to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. They will be compelled to do that or to repudiate.

Mr. OWEN. They will either be compelled to do that or to repudiate, one or the other, and repudiation is impossible.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if it is not believed that it is possible for men in this country who are wealthy and who are able to extend loans to the people of Europe to do business, if they so desire, without any legislation whatever?

Mr. OWEN. They are doing it to a considerable extent anyway, and they will continue to do it to a considerable extent anyway; but we, of course, have found it necessary during the period of the war, because of the disconcerting effects of war and the dislocations which followed, to provide some machinery that would help to overcome the difficulties due to the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator that the bill which we passed here a week or 10 days ago——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator refers to the Edge bill? That will help.

Mr. SMOOT. I refer to the bill for the establishment of banks in this country for the purpose of doing foreign business, which follows the system that is now being carried on in Europe; in other words, the Finnish proposition is on all fours with what is proposed in that bill.

Mr. OWEN. The explanation to which I have referred of the British policy is so plain that I ask permission to read it. It will only take a minute, and I think it ought to be understood. It is very simple.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have a copy of it, and I have already read it.

Mr. OWEN. This explanation reads:

FINLAND AS A FIELD FOR BRITISH TRADE.

Foremost among such loans is that being arranged for the Republic of Finland. Under its new independence Finland has the makings of a valuable field for British trade. Its civilization and education are already well developed and its industries are capable of great expansion. It has produce that we need and it urgently needs goods that we can supply.

We can have her butter and other farm produce if we will send her our goods in return. But she must have our goods, not only as payment but also to feed her own industries, which depend very largely on imports of raw material, which before the war were received mainly from Germany.

Sanction has been given by His Majesty's treasury to the issue in this country of a loan to Finland, on the understanding that the proceeds will be expended in the purchase of goods in the United Kingdom. That is actually the object of the loan—to enable the Finnish Government and the State Bank of Finland to finance the purchase of British goods. It is a loan to get trade going between the United Kingdom and Finland, for the mutual benefit of both countries. As this trade develops it will be financed by the ordinary mercantile and banking machinery, and the loan will gradually be repaid—

Just the process the Senator pointed out—

Provision has, in fact, been made for the gradual liquidation of the loan within a certain period by half-yearly installments. It is essentially a loan for trade. It is not a loan to pay her works that may or may not prove productive, but a loan to finance British trade and to be liquidated out of the benefits that Finland will derive from that trade.

The actual process will be that the proceeds of the loan will be spent in this country in the purchase of forestry and agricultural machinery and tools, in cotton and woolen yarns and cloth, in soap and numerous other articles of household necessity manufactured in this country,

The Finnish marks so obtained will be spent in Finland on the purchase of timber, dairy produce, and all those raw materials for which the British public has at present to pay such an exorbitant price, but which Finland and the countries beyond Finland produce. These are lying in great abundance in Finland, but can not be moved because of the lack of finance.

That is the whole story—

They will be shipped to Great Britain and the proceeds banked here, so reestablishing the Finnish credit. This process will be continued again and again, each time with profit for banker, merchant, manufacturer, and workman in both Great Britain and Finland, and the general community of both countries will benefit by being able to purchase at reasonable cost those articles the other is best able to produce. This is the manner in which trade follows capital.

It is a common-sense statement, which I think will appeal to everyone who hears it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand the main purpose of the joint resolution is to extend the period of the operation of the Finance Corporation and also to extend the period within which it shall wind up its affairs.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; to extend the period within which it may operate and permit it greater latitude in the handling of foreign commerce. Our foreign commerce at present is very much hampered by lack of facilities; it is not adequately financed and the banks of our coast cities have gone just about as far as they can go with the resources at their command.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GRONNA. I object to it at the present time, because I think if the bill which the Senate passed the other day and which went to the House comes back and becomes a law there will be no necessity for passing the joint resolution.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; there will.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD in connection with the statement I made on the proposed amendment of the War Finance Corporation act a resolution passed by the Chicago Live Stock Exchange, urging some action with regard to matters of financing exports. I do not ask to have it read, but merely to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CHICAGO LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Union Stock Yards, Chicago, Ill.

FARMERS FACING FINANCIAL RUIN.

Whereas the prosperity of the American farmer and live-stock producer is essential to the prosperity of the Nation; and

Whereas the present level of live-stock prices can only be maintained by the uninterrupted exportation of meat products to European countries, and unless maintained at the present or a higher plane thousands of producers are facing financial ruin; and

Whereas Europe's purchasing power is being rapidly lessened by the lowering value of her money, as illustrated by the following table:

	Normal value.	Present value.	Present purchasing power.
	Cents.	Cents.	Per cent of normal.
Austrian crown	20.3	2.00	9.9
Jugo Slavia crown	20.3	2.15	10.6
Czecho-Slovakian crown	20.3	3.15	15.5
Polish mark	23.8	3.75	15.8
German mark	23.8	4.00	16.8
Roumanian lei	19.3	4.35	22.5
Finland mark	19.3	6.50	33.6
Servian dinar	19.3	8.20	42.5
Italian lira	19.3	10.30	53.6
Belgian franc	19.3	11.80	60.9
French franc	19.3	11.80	60.9
English pound	487.0	416.00	85.4

And

Whereas Europe's wage earners can not buy the bare necessities of life and particularly products of American farms at the prevailing prices, and inevitable disaster would befall our farmers if prices were lowered to present exchange basis; and

Whereas a stabilization of foreign-exchange rates, coupled with the tremendous demand for our products, would doubtless restore our live-stock markets to the level reached in recent months and stabilize live-stock prices: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Chicago Live Stock Exchange, That we urge upon the Congress of the United States the importance of the immediate creation of a fund to be used in the stabilization of foreign-exchange rates until Europe once more resumes her normal commerce and her exports suffice to equalize her imports, and thus bring about the proper trade balance; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each United States Senator and Member of the House of Representatives and to the agricultural press of the country with a letter of transmittal urging immediate action.

GRAVES OF AMERICAN SOLDIERS ON FOREIGN SOIL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there are two bills on the calendar reported from the Committee on Military Affairs which I think deserve the immediate consideration of the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar No. 151, being Senate bill 2923.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2923) to provide funds for the care and maintenance of the graves on foreign soil of members of the military forces of the United States, which the Secretary read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds appropriated for the disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 19, 1919, shall be available for the care and maintenance of the graves on foreign soil of members of the military forces of the United States under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs by the Secretary of War concerning the bill.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 20, 1919.

THE CHAIRMAN MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Under date of July 8, 1919, a cablegram was received from Gen. Pershing in which he gave an outline of the steps that had been taken by the cemeterial branch to maintain and care for the graves of American dead buried in Europe. The arrangements made by Gen. Pershing in regard to this matter were approved on July 18, 1919, and he was advised that the military attachés to Great Britain and Italy would be directed to supervise the maintenance and care of graves in those countries, under instructions and regulations to cover these cases that were then being drafted in the War Department.

In considering all the points raised in Gen. Pershing's cablegram it was apparent that funds would be needed for the purpose of carrying his recommendations into effect, and upon looking into the matter it was found that under an opinion of the Judge Advocate General, dated May 15, 1919, published in Digest of Opinions of the Judge Advocate General of the Army of May 15, 1919, there is no appropriation available to carry these instructions and recommendations into effect, and that special authorization for that purpose must be made by Congress.

If this is to be done, it is the opinion of the War Department that it was the intent of Congress to have the matter of caring for the graves of American dead provided for from the appropriation "Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees," as provided for in Public No. 21, Sixty-sixth Congress, H. R. 7343. This conclusion was reached not so much in the wording of the appropriation as from the fact that the appropriation for 1920 is $8,451,000 as against an initial appropriation of $250,000 for 1919 and a deficiency of $710,000.

The question of whether or not funds from the appropriation above referred to were available for the maintenance and care of the graves of the American dead buried in Europe was taken up informally with the Comptroller of the Treasury, and he was of the opinion that more specific authorization from Congress should be given than is contained in the wording of the bill under which the appropriation was made.

In order, therefore, to meet the requirements of the accountings officers of the Treasury in regard to expenditures from the appropriation referred to for the above purpose, may I ask that you take the necessary steps to have the proposed draft of a bill, herewith, enacted into law? No additional appropriation of funds is sought in the legislation requested.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER.

CAMP A. A. HUMPHREYS, VA.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 185, being House joint resolution 208. I may say to Senators present, and particularly to the Senator from Utah, who, I think, took some interest in the matter yesterday, that when I endeavored to secure unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution yesterday during the order of business of reports of committees, objection was made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Since that time, after examination of the joint resolution, the Senator from Minnesota has withdrawn his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 208) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is that the joint resolution to which objection was made yesterday by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York states, however, that the Senator from Minnesota has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he knows the attitude of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] regarding the joint resolution. My understanding is that he has some observations to submit respecting this measure, if not some opposition to it. I am not sure as to that. He has been sent for. Does the Senator know his position?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not heard any objection on the part of the Senator from Oregon. I can not remember now whether the Senator from Oregon was present at the meeting of the committee yesterday when the joint resolution was reported; but the joint resolution was reported by a unanimous vote and has already passed the House. I can not remember whether the Senator from Oregon was present.

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator from New York to withhold his presentation of the matter until the Senator from Oregon arrives. I have sent for him.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the meantime the Senator from New York can explain the purpose of the joint resolution and its scope. As I understand, it is entirely an emergency matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the joint resolution will occupy time. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend the following sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., for the completion of bungalow quarters, now partially constructed, including gravel roads, walks, sidewalks, sewers, electric light lines, heating, water lines, painting, clearing, brushing, grading, sodding, and alteration of existing buildings and miscellaneous incidental construction incident thereto, not exceeding $116,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend not exceeding $20,000 from sums already appropriated for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1920, such maintenance and repair funds as may be necessary for maintenance and repair work, storage of material, and clearing up débris at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, was the appropriation that it is sought to transfer only $20,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are two items in the joint resolution, one for $116,000 and one for $20,000, both sums that are to be made available out of other appropriations.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps the Senator will explain the matter. It so happens that I have been down at Camp Humphreys and have gone all over it. To develop that into a permanent camp will cost millions of dollars, and I can see no purpose in that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall be very glad to explain this joint resolution.

Senators will probably remember that a very large cantonment was built upon land purchased by the Government in the early part of the war at Camp Humphreys. It was used during the war as a training camp or cantonment for Engineer replacement troops. The men who were trained in that camp were forwarded to France as replacements in the Engineer units of the American Expeditionary Forces. At the conclusion of the hostilities, there being no further need for Camp Humphreys as a training place for replacements, the War Department transferred the Engineer School from Washington Barracks, here in the city of Washington, and established it at Camp Humphreys. It ought to be said that the Washington Barracks reservation here in Washington City is quite inadequate for the maintenance of an Engineer school. It is quite impossible to train Engineer officers and troops in a place of that sort, as there is no terrain proper for their exercise or training. The Camp Humphreys site contains something like 6,400 acres, owned in fee simple by the Government, and it was thought wise by the department to make that place the permanent home of the Engineer School. Therefore, in December last appropriate orders were issued directing that the school be established there, after being removed from Washington Barracks.

This involves the stationing at Camp Humphreys of a considerable number of Engineer officers and Engineer student officers. Senators will remember that at least two classes were graduated from West Point during the last war prematurely, without having actually finished their courses, and were commissioned in the Army. None of those men thus graduated from West Point prematurely have had any of the engineer training which officers in the Engineer Corps itself have always received in the Engineer School. The result is that there is an unusual accumulation of officers awaiting study and training in the Engineer School.

The War Department made a contract for the erection at Camp Humphreys of 70 small bungalows, in which these officers and their families were to be quartered. The bungalows were to be of one story, without cellars, without attics, built of wood, frame construction, ceiled on the inside with cardboard. The annual appropriation bill for the support of the Army contained a provision forbidding the War Department to expend any moneys appropriated in that bill, or appropriated prior to the enactment of that bill, for construction. The result was that the bungalows, which were then partly constructed, had to be left standing just as they were. Thirty-eight of them had been commenced. The remainder of the total of 70 had not been commenced. They have stood since the 11th day of July in that condition. Some of them are but 10 per cent completed. Several others are 90 per cent completed. There is no place at Camp Humphreys for an officer and his family to live. These men are ordered there. There is no other engineer school in the country to which they can go under the auspices of the War Department. It is the earnest request of the Engineer Corps, the War Department, the committee of the House, and the committee of the Senate, both of which have gone into this thing very thoroughly, that the Congress pass a joint resolution such as this, making available this limited sum out of appropriations heretofore made for the completion of those bungalows.

The emergency in the case arises from the fact that we are now upon the verge of winter, and if these little bungalows are not finished there is no proper place there in which officers and their families can be quartered. The bachelor officers are quartered in the cantonment buildings themselves, in the wooden barracks. The classrooms and shops have been put into these wooden buildings for the time being, in the hope that later on proper facilities may be acquired at Camp Humphreys; but this is purely temporary construction, upon land owned by the Government, and to take care of the married officers out of the total of 269 officers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. A great many of us believe—or, at least, I will speak for myself—I believe from investigation which has been made that in many particulars the War Department has been not only extravagant but criminally extravagant; that in the erection of buildings and in the acquisition of lands upon which to construct buildings there has been not only no reasonable care, but an entire lack of prudence and care and caution in the selection and in the erection of such buildings.

The Senator will recall that before we entered the war the Government had a large number of posts and Army camps throughout the United States, many of which were suitable for schools and for the placing of a large number of officers for training and for school purposes. Since the war began the Government has acquired a large number of other camps, and millions of dollars, indeed, tens if not hundreds of millions of dollars, have been expended in the erection of buildings upon these sites, as well as the erection and repair of buildings upon the old sites. I will ask the Senator, in view of that fact—the large number of camps and posts which the Government has and the millions of dollars which have been expended in buildings—if there can not be found amongst all this multitude of camps and sites and posts a place that is suitable for 269 officers, instead of trying to build up another camp?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the trouble is that all the camps that were built during the war, and to which the Senator refers, are exactly like Camp Humphreys. They do not provide any facilities for officers and their families. This is to be, and is now, a permanent Army post; and under the law the Government is required to provide quarters for an officer's family or else pay him commutation of quarters. Now, it would be entirely feasible to pay these officers commutation of quarters if it were possible for them to find any quarters for their families in the neighborhood, but that is utterly impossible. This cantonment is like all the others; it is of temporary construction. You can not very well put officers and their families into the barracks, as there are no opportunities for privacy and no opportunity to establish a home in which a family can live. The purpose of this bill is to permit them to complete the construction of these little bungalows that were started last winter, but whose completion was prevented by the passage of the annual appropriation bill containing the clause to which I have referred. There could not possibly be a cheaper way of providing quarters for these men.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this measure. At the same time, I want to express my firm conviction that it is a waste of money, that it is squandering this amount of money; but the War Department has squandered so much, and apparently there is a determination to persist in the extravagance and in the squandering, so that perhaps an objection now, or a protest made now, will not avail.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not rise to object. I only rise to explain the reason of my question, having gone over Camp Humphreys and seen the whole camp, which is very large.

There are, I should say, hundreds of buildings there, most of which I should suppose, will be discarded and torn down. It is an immense area. We have had 40,000 troops there at one time engaged in building a road to Alexandria. They built a very fine road, too. Now, if this is going to be a permanent Engineer school, we are entering upon a very large expenditure. I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I hope that this does not mean a continuance of great expenditures at that camp.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator any reason to believe that if they start on this they will not find some excuse for building more buildings and continuing the school there? And of course that will necessitate the expenditure of millions.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know what their plans are. The statement of the Senator from New York is a perfectly reasonable one. I can see the need of this small amount of money to prevent these buildings going to ruin, and I see no objection to using it for the time being as an Engineer school; but it does seem to me that it is a very large matter and ought to be very carefully considered before we go any further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts that when the proposal was made to the Committee on Military Affairs for a large appropriation to be made this year for the erection of elaborate and permanent buildings at Camp Humphreys the request was denied.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it seemed to the committee when this matter was presented that it was rather imperative. These people have already been assembled for instruction down there, and there is no housing provided. It is necessary that this be done in order to continue this instruction. It does not follow because this is done, or will be done, that there is going to be any permanent great expenditure at Camp Humphreys for this particular purpose or hereafter for the development of any engineering school. This seemed to be necessary, and the testimony and hearing developed conclusively that it was necessary at this time; and I hope the joint resolution will be allowed to pass.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. GEN. CROWDER.

Mr. KNOX. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2867) to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been asked by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to do him the favor of sending for him if this bill were called up.

Mr. KNOX. I think that is perfectly proper. But if the Chair means to indicate by that that if the Senator from Oregon were present he would object to unanimous consent, we might as well save the trouble of sending for him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair knows nothing about the Senator's attitude toward a request for unanimous consent; only that he preferred a request that he should be sent for if the bill came up.

Mr. KNOX. I withdraw the request for the present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Is the morning business closed, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate go into open executive session to consider the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. The Secretary will continue the reading. He will begin, I believe, at the top of page 109.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are not the Fall amendments before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; but I understand it was thought wise to read all the Fall amendments and the treaty at the same time, saving reading them twice, before the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] began to discuss them.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty, as follows:

"Article 74.

"The French Government reserves the right to retain and liquidate all the property, rights and interests which German nationals or societies controlled by Germany possessed in the territories referred to in Article 51 on November 11, 1918, subject to the conditions laid down in the last paragraph of Article 53 above.

"Germany will directly compensate her nationals who may have been dispossessed by the aforesaid liquidations.

"The product of these liquidations shall be applied in accordance with the stipulations of Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Are the so-called Fall amendments printed separately?

Mr. LODGE. No; they run to No. 46.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean, are they printed in the ordinary form of Senate committee amendments?

Mr. LODGE. They are printed in the treaty just as amendments are always printed in a bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is there any document at the desk which will show a list of the pages upon which they occur?

Mr. LODGE. That appears in the print of the document itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary can give the pages; there is no document at the desk giving them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the Secretary state, if he will, the numbers of the pages upon which the several Fall amendments occur.

The SECRETARY. The amendment to strike out the words "and Associated" between the word "Allied" and the word "Powers" occurs in—

Mr. LODGE. The other amendments the Senator from Connecticut does not care to have read, I suppose?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No. Those that have been given are, I understand, the instances in which the words "and Associated" are stricken out?

The SECRETARY. That is all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What are the other Fall amendments? I will not ask that they be read.

Mr. LODGE. There are two others, relating to the reparation commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To what articles are they amendments, and what are the pages on which they occur? My object is to have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD state, for the information of the readers of it, where these proposed amendments occur in the printed copy of the treaty.

The SECRETARY. On page 129, in subdivision 2, of the Annex, the words "the United States of America" and the comma are proposed to be stricken out before the word "France."

On page 261, in the third line in the second paragraph of subdivision 2 of Annex 2, the words "the United States" and the comma, before the words "Great Britain," are proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. Page 261, in subdivision 2, of Annex No. 2.

Mr. FALL. Then there is an insertion.

Mr. LODGE. There is an insertion printed there.

The SECRETARY. Following the word "occasions."

Mr. FALL. That is amendment No. 46.

The SECRETARY. Amendment 46, on page 261, following the word "occasions," insert:

The Delegate of the United States shall have no vote in the proceedings of the commission except concerning a matter wherein such delegate is specifically instructed by his Government to take part in proceedings of the commission and to cast and record the vote of the United States thereupon; but shall always have such right when Annex 3 to the reparation clauses or any section thereof is under consideration.

Mr. FALL. One of the amendments found on page 77 was not referred to in its order, and I ask in connection with the reading by the Secretary of the list of the amendments and the pages upon which they are found that it may be noted that on page 77 there is amendment to article 17 inserting the words "or the United States of America."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. All those amendments were adopted by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, inasmuch as the report of the committee only shows the reservations, I wanted this information to appear in the RECORD, so that we would know what they are, and that the committee had reported them.

Mr. FALL. They were all adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They were adopted by the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I would like to inquire if there is any action to be taken upon these amendments at this time?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not understand that action will be had. They are before the Senate for consideration, and certain Senators intend to address the Senate upon them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What disposition is asked to be made of these amendments?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They are being read now.

Mr. LODGE. No disposition has been asked. The portions of the treaty which include them are being read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, at what point in the treaty is the Secretary now reading?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). On page 109. Article 74 has just been read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in connection with the apparent debate which took place upon yesterday between the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and me, in which, by the way, neither of us did himself justice, I want to read a very short letter appearing in the Evening Post, of New York, signed by Robert R. Reed, a sound lawyer, and a man of brilliant intellect, whom I have known for several years. It is as follows:

BRITISH VOTES IN THE LEAGUE COUNCIL.

To the Editor of the Evening Post.

SIR: It is, of course, not to be expected that all Senators should be preeminent authorities in international law or specialists in the proper reading and interpretation of international agreements. But certainly most of them may be supposed to have an aptitude for counting votes. They also know, or should know, when a vote is not a vote, but something else. Possibly one of the antileague Senators will explain the relative value of six votes compared with one vote in a body which can only act by unanimous agreement. To a nonpolitical person it would seem that the five extra votes, so called, accorded the British dominions have the effect chiefly of tying a string to the "vote" of the mother country. The effect is the same as though Great Britain's one vote was subject to a proviso that it should not be cast except with the advice and consent of her five dominions. Will not some Senator experienced in the matter of votes point out the difference, if any? If, as should perhaps be the case, our one vote can be cast only with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, it would seem that our total "votes" must exceed those cast by all other nations.

ROBERT R. REED.

NEW YORK, September 5.

Mr. President, upon the same question there was forwarded to me this morning by somebody, by whom I do not know, another short excerpt from the Evening Post entitled "That British Vote," and reading as follows:

THAT BRITISH "VOTE."

To the editor of the Evening Post:

SIR: The representation of Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and India in the league assembly has many bearings. Its actual legal effect is little more than a provision requiring Great Britain to obtain the assent of all her dominions before casting her "vote" in the assembly. Conceding that it means nothing in its effect on the so-called voting power of the British Empire, it may mean a great deal in its effect upon our own future. It will mean a great deal if the United States Senate directly affronts not England but Canada, Australia, and South Africa in their aspirations to practical independence and a voice in world affairs. No nation has so much to gain from their representation as the United States. In any possible dispute with Japan in the Pacific we will have the voices and "votes" of three English-speaking nations on the Pacific. In any possible dispute with Great Britain we can reasonably hope to divide that Empire against itself, to appeal from the traditional aristocracy to the rising democracies of the British Empire.

The future of the world may have many small troubles to be adjusted. It will have a few great problems, and those great problems are of vastly greater consequence than all the small ones. They are problems in which both the solidarity and weight of the great democracies will have to hold against tendencies and aspirations for which Germany, Russia, and Japan stand as names to-day. They are problems in which we should like to see the English-speaking democracies standing together and with a dominant strength. We have had our own quarrels with England. We may have quarrels with Canada, Australia, or South Africa. But is there any question anywhere that our great permanent interest lies in strengthening the influence and furthering the aspirations of the great English-speaking democracies?

Now, Mr. President, there arose further in the debate yesterday some question as to referring back to Germany an amended treaty of peace. Of course, if the contract between us and Germany is amended by us alone it must be referred back to Germany, because she is the other party to the contract or to the compact or to the pact or however else you choose to designate it.

I cut out of the Washington Post this morning the following special cable, and I read it now as reenforcing what I said yesterday, trying to combat the general impression that Germany is to-day helpless and that we need not regard her. We have once said to her, "Sign here upon the dotted line," and she has signed. A great many of you seem to think that we can say to her every week in the year, "Sign here again upon the dotted line." In that you are woefully mistaken.

In that connection I read this:

Berlin, September 25—

This is sent to the Washington Post—

PERIL TO PACT HERE STIRRING GERMANY—DEMOCRATIC CIRCLES ALARMED AND MONARCHISTS SEE BIG POSSIBILITIES.

[Special cable to the Washington Post.]

BERLIN, September 25.

Reports indicating the possibility that the peace treaty may not be ratified by the United States are causing consternation in democratic circles throughout Germany, while the monarchists and reactionaries are watching with increasing interest the deliberations of the American Senate.

Count Reventlow writes in the Tageszeitung—

The translation of which is, "The Daily Journal"—

that nonratification by the United States Senate "would create a multitude of new perspectives for Germany"—

"Create a multitude of new perspectives for Germany." That is the language of Count Reventlow, with whose history and record in Germany as a servant of the Kaiser and as a mouthpiece of modern German war theology and war philosophy all of you are acquainted.

I proceed to read further:

which a shrewd, active German Government could exploit."

That is the language of Count Reventlow—

Which a shrewd, active German Government could exploit.

Now, possibly some of you think they could not exploit it. Take my word for it, they can. At least, Reventlow thinks so, and is lying in wait for the opportunity.

It is significant—

I am reading, now, no longer from the quotation from Count Reventlow, but from the report:

It is significant that the Frankfort Gazette, which, during the war and armistice, glorified President Wilson's policies, now discusses with alarm—

I suppose, Mr. President, that you are acquainted with the record of the Frankfort Gazette. It is about the only paper in Germany that stood out for weeks and months against junkerism and against the Kaiser, was several times silenced by orders from Berlin but always made its reappearance at some time—discusses with alarm the possibility of nonratification, saying the importance and far-reaching consequences of the attitude of the representatives of the American people—

Of course, that indicates German ignorance. Calling this Senate "the representatives of the American people" is a woeful fraction of their ignorance—absolute Teutonic ignorance, only equaled by the stupidity of their diplomatic procedures during the late war. But, at any rate, that is the language of the article—far-reaching consequences of the attitude of the representatives of the American people are very great, not only for the United States but also for Germany.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, as the usual afternoon hour has been occupied by the exchange editor of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I will only occupy a very few moments of the time of the golf players of the Senate and others to say that at the earliest moment, when the present agreement as to procedure in the Senate may have been fulfilled and the Senate is again attending to business, I shall take occasion to refer to the only argument that I have heard that I think is worthy of reference and answer, to a few remarks which were made yesterday afternoon by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] with reference to the matter then under discussion, the right of the United States to adopt any reservations or amendments, or to propose any reservations or amendments or any changes in the treaty which it may please to propose or to adopt, without the fear which so many seem to entertain that it would be necessary to again approach Germany upon the subject.

At this time I understand it has been agreed that there should be no vote and no lengthy proceedings upon the pending matter.

I will not undertake to disturb the rest of some of the Senators——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Quietude, call it.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Mississippi suggests quietude, and I gratefully adopt his suggestion. It is my purpose, of course, as I announced several days since, to discuss the amendments which are being read, and that I shall probably do at some length, and upon that occasion I shall refer to the matter which I have indicated.

To me the propositions announced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] yesterday afternoon and by other Senators who were playing like minnows around him are so easily and simply answered that it is at least merely another indication of the fact that if we can not agree upon the construction of one article of the treaty, the world will never be able to agree upon its construction. Therefore, the claim of some of us that it simply counts for trouble in the future rather than for allaying or delaying trouble, it seems to me will be well proven. I shall undertake that upon another occasion, as I have said. I had hoped to reach it to-day; in fact, I sought recognition yesterday afternoon for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator from Montana, while his attention was directed to these particular points, to some certain matters to which I thought he had not given consideration. I shall avail myself of the opportunity at a very early date to do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, upon yesterday I called attention to the difficulties of the two situations with which the American people have been confronted—first, when they were confronted with the idea of adopting the Constitution of the United States and were confronted with the question of whether they should amend it beforehand or afterwards, and the present situation when they are confronted with the league of nations and with the proposition of whether they shall amend it beforehand or afterwards.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has just dwelt upon the point that where there were differences of opinion about the interpretation of an article in the instrument, that meant that the article ought to be defeated, if I understand him correctly. If that course had been pursued when the Constitution of the United States was being considered, it would have been defeated almost unanimously, but our ancestors chose rather to adopt the Constitution as proposed and then to amend it afterwards.

Now, the Senator says a difference of opinion about an article in an instrument means that that instrument is worthless. If that test were to be applied to the Constitution of the United States, Mr. President—I think there were 108 law cases growing out of different interpretations of one article of the Constitution of the United States, to wit, the fourteenth amendment, and even more growing out of Article X of the Constitution which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people"—measured by that test, we should have had no civilized government in America; we should have had no constitutional and representative government; we should have defeated the whole Constitution on the ground that there were pin pricks that might have been inserted into almost every article in it. Wiser men than the Senator from New Mexico, wiser men than I or you, Mr. President, advised in that day that we accept the Constitution and amend it later. To-day the real wise men of America, in church and school and state, are advising that we accept this league of nations and this treaty and amend the league of nations later.

I want to emphasize what I said yesterday, that any reasonable proposition of amendment carried to the council, which is composed of only nine men representing nine governments, will meet with welcome reception, because all of those governments are running over one another—emulating one another in trying to run over each other—in order to gain the good will of the United States. It will be much easier to amend the league of nations after ratification than it was or is to amend the Constitution of the United States after its adoption.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact—of course, it is not necessary to call it to the attention of any of the other Senators—or to refresh the memory of the Senator from Mississippi, that with reference to the Constitution of the United States it is true that we have adopted more than one amendment to it; but the people of the United States have adopted them, and they have not left it to the other nations of this earth either to suggest or to ratify them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President, such a "lame and impotent conclusion," coming from a man so abounding in good sense as the Senator from New Mexico, is absolutely astonishing. True, the Constitution of the United States was "adopted solely by the people of America," because it applied only to the people of America; but the constitution of the world in this league of nations must be adopted, if at all, by the world, because it applies to all the world. What does the Senator from New Mexico mean by that sort of suggestion?

Mr. FALL. I indicated that I thought the Senator from Mississippi would not understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President, again the Senator says that he did not expect me to understand. Of course I can not understand that sort of nonsense; I freely admit that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not propose to correct the understanding of the Senator from Mississippi, but in relation to his remarks——

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I sought an opportunity to say a word in connection with the remark of the Senator from New Mexico that at a later day he will discuss the question of our right to amend the covenant of the league of nations without the assent or concurrence of Germany. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me, I shall be very glad to say just a word.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall listen with very great interest, indeed, to the explanation of the views of the Senator from New Mexico on that question. On yesterday I told in a general way about a multitude of provisions of the treaty of most vital consequence to Germany in which the interposition of the council of the league of nations is essential, and stated that by reason of those provisions Germany is vitally interested in the constitution of the league of nations, though she is not a member of the league. I open the copy of the text at random, for instance, and turn to the provision for the plebiscite under which at the expiration of 15 years the fate of the Saar Basin is to be determined. After providing for the plebiscite by which the future of that important section of Germany is to be determined, provision is made for the election and for the participation of inhabitants over 20 years of age without regard to sex, and the following occurs:

> The other conditions, methods, and the date of the voting shall be fixed by the council of the league of nations in such a way as to secure the freedom, secrecy, and trustworthiness of the voting.

Accordingly, the council of the league of nations is really going to make the law under which all the machinery for the election is to be put into operation. Doubtless it will pass a registration law for the particular occasion; that is to say, it will lay down rules and regulations under which the election is to take place.

But it has very grave duties in addition to that; for instance, section 35 reads:

> The league of nations shall decide on the sovereignty under which the territory is to be placed, taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants as expressed by the voting.

Then it specifies:

> If the league of nations decides in favor of the union of the whole or part of the territory of the Saar Basin with Germany, France's rights of ownership in the mines situated in such part of the territory will be repurchased by Germany in their entirety at a price payable in gold. The price to be paid will be fixed by three experts, one nominated by Germany, one by France, and one, who shall be neither a Frenchman nor a German, by the council of the league of nations; the decision of the experts will be given by a majority.

In connection with the comments of the Senator I shall submit for the information of the Senate at that time a list of the various provisions of the treaty in the execution of which the league of nations takes a part in matters of the most vital concern to Germany. Therefore, all of the provisions, at least those constituting the membership of the league, are of very vital concern to that country.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the list which the Senator from Montana proposes to furnish will, of course, be very useful in some respects. However, I can not see anything which would connect the statement which he has just made with the argument he was making yesterday afternoon. There is no proposed amendment striking the league of nations from the Saar Basin commission or other commissions. There is no provision in the treaty for the appointment of an American representative on the Saar Basin commission, although there is upon some of the other commissions. I asked the President why, and he answered:

No mention was made in connection with the settlement of the Saar Basin of the service of an American member on the commission of five to be set up there.

Very well. In so far as Germany is concerned, if America is not to be represented, it might as well be provided that no representative of America shall serve upon the Saar Basin commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

Mr. FALL. Pardon me. The question of amendments to the articles of the covenant of the league of nations has nothing to do with our right to amend the articles of the covenant at all, unless the amendment is to provide that we abolish the council of the league; then the Senator's argument might be appropriate; but there is no proposition here and no amendment proposing to abolish the council of the league of nations, and the council of the league of nations as provided in the treaty will still continue, in so far as any reservation or amendment is concerned, to operate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is quite true that the United States is not represented on the commission which is to govern the Saar Basin during the period of 15 years; but that is not the point I make. The point I make is that when the period of 15 years has expired, then a plebiscite is to be held and the whole matter of conducting the election is to be under the supervision of the league of nations. If it determines that the territory shall go back to Germany, the council of the league of nations will appoint the members of the commission which is to determine the amount that is to be paid. Those are the sections to which I call the attention of the Senator; but——

Mr. FALL. I understand, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, it is not essential that an amendment shall be proposed, of course, that would entirely strike out and obliterate the council of the league of nations. The manner in which that council is constituted is a matter of vital importance to Germany; the question of who shall be members of that council is a matter of vital importance to her.

Mr. FALL. But that is not settled in the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but the Senator asserts as a general proposition that we may amend the covenant of the league of nations in any way we see fit without the consent of Germany.

Mr. FALL. Certainly; exactly as the Senator reported to the full committee of the Committee on the Judiciary and to the Senate, that, despite the Rhineland provisions in this treaty, it will be proper for us to enter into a separate treaty with France and Great Britain to enforce article 43 and other articles of the treaty——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not able to follow the Senator in that illustration.

Mr. FALL. In absolute violation of the treaty with Germany—in spirit, in letter, and in words.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article from the pen of Maj. Gen. William Crozier, published in last Sunday's Times, referring to the proposed reservations of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Times, Sunday, Sept. 14.]

GEN. CROZIER POINTS TO INCONSISTENCIES IN RESERVATIONS TO LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

(By Maj. Gen. William Crozier, United States Army, retired.)

(Gen. Crozier was one of the American delegates to the first peace conference at The Hague in 1899 and is now the sole survivor of the American representation there. He has made a deep study of international matters.)

The fundamental office claimed by its advocates for the league of nations is that of preserver of the peace of the world. This office is the one which has been in the minds of the proponents of all similar schemes down to and including Mr. Taft's League to Enforce Peace. The idea is naturally embodied in the covenant, which forms part of the treaty of peace.

Various articles of the covenant prescribe particular duties for member nations of the league in the matter of keeping the peace. Article 10 is their individual promise to protect one another's territory and government from external aggression. Article 16 details certain measures of coercion which members agree to take against any nation which resorts to war in disregard of its covenant. But the article in which the organization declares its intention to use its great power for carrying out the main purpose of the association is article 11, which reads, in part, as follows:

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared to be a matter of concern to the whole league and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations."

This is an essential announcement, in which the majesty of the league is asserted for the central purpose of its existence. It may be said to contain the teeth of the covenant.

The second item of the resolution of ratification which the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is reported to have adopted states, among other things, "That the United States declines to assume, under the provisions of article 10, or under any other article, any obligation * * * to interfere in controversies between other nations, members of the league or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the league or not, against external aggression, or for the purpose of coercing any other country * * * except by action of the Congress of the United States.

A good deal of the procedure contemplated in articles 10 and 16 could not be taken without the action of Congress in any case; the reported resolution, therefore, constitutes a declination to bring any moral pressure upon Congress by the treaty-making power, such as was brought by the peace treaty after the Spanish War in promising to pay $20,000,000 for public works in the Philippine Islands, for example, and the words which are italicized extend the declination to the solemn declaration of article 11. Certain steps which might be taken without preliminary action by Congress, such as inquiry as to the intentions of a government in regard to a neighboring country, or a reminder of the terms of the covenant in such manner as, perhaps, to constitute a threat to enforce peace, might be held to "interfere in controversies between other nations," and would then be among the things which the United States, under the terms of the resolution, declines to obligate itself to do. The second item of the resolution thus seems to leave this country entirely outside the league in regard to the principal purpose for which the league is created.

But article 10 is not altogether repudiated, and we are left under promise to respect the existing political independence of all members of the league, which bars us from the exercise of our independent judgment as to the necessity for intervention in any country which might acquire membership in the league for the purpose of securing therein decent living conditions for its own inhabitants and respect for the lives of our citizens, no matter how backward the country might be.

The authoritative intention of the league to preserve the peace of the world having been announced in article 11, articles 12, 13, and 15 contain the engagements of the individual member nations to settle their disputes peacefully if possible, either by arbitration or by action of the council; and of these articles No. 15 is the final definite promise to submit to the council any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration, and to refrain from going to war with any party to the dispute which complies with a report of the committee which is unanimously agreed to by the members other than the representatives of the parties to the dispute. This promise constitutes the ultimate subordination of the member nations to the authority of the league in matter in which the council, excluding the parties to the dispute, is able to reach a unanimous conclusion.

The third item of the resolution adopted by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations reserves from the promises of article 15 all matters which it considers to be within our domestic jurisdiction, defining a number of them; and the fourth item reserves all matters which would depend upon or relate to the Monroe doctrine. The committee thus makes it clear that it is not ready to trust the league as required by article 15, in regard to matters of such intimate importance to the United States as those which relate to domestic questions and to the Monroe doctrine, but the singular thing is that the committee is apparently willing to subordinate the independent judgment of the United States to that of the league in regard to any question outside the classes reserved, no matter how important it might be.

The net result of the last three items of the committee's resolution, therefore, is to withdraw the United States from the league in so far as the assumption of responsibility for the peace of the world and the intention to enforce it are concerned, while leaving us subject, under our promise, to the control of the league in regard to all disputes upon questions which are not domestic or do not come under the Monroe doctrine. That is, we are withdrawn from everything that is forceful and authoritative in regard to the world's good order, while left in subjection as to our own disputes which do not fall within certain categories.

Under such conditions particular value attaches to the first item of the committee's resolution, which safeguards the right of the United States to withdraw from the league upon its own motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few moments ago referred to the fact that the other high contracting parties to this treaty were very anxious to get us into the league, and, being so anxious, it would be very easy for us, after we entered the league, to secure any amendment to it that we desired. There is no doubt about their anxiety to get us into the league. Why should they not be anxious to get the assistance of 110,000,000 people to back up the decision of a council in which they have an overwhelming majority, and to bear the expense to a large degree?

The anxiety, however, which from their points of view they are justified in having to get us into this entanglement is no criterion whatever of what their anxiety might be to agree to demands that we might make after we were in and the door was locked behind us.

Mr. President, the President of the United States stated to the Committee on Foreign Relations at the White House that when he was protesting against what we call the Shantung infamy, which nobody defends here, the Japanese commissioners at the peace conference notified him that if the Shantung provision was not agreed to their instructions were to withdraw from the conference. Senators can see how easy it would be to secure amendments upon which ideas might differ after we were in the league. Suppose we proposed an amendment, if it is possible to extract from the obscure and defective provisions of article 26 how an amendment could be proposed. Suppose we proposed an amendment, after we were in, that was unsatisfactory to Japan, and Japan should say to us: "Well, we do not like the amendment, but we will agree to the amendment"—it taking unanimous consent—"provided you will allow our nationals to come into your country under your immigration laws upon the same basis that the nationals of any other country come into your country, and that is the only condition upon which we will agree to it. We attempted to get your agreement to our claim for racial equality before the peace commission, but we were turned down, and we served notice at the time that we reserved the assertion of that claim to some other time. Now is our time. You are in, and you can not get out. You can not get out without giving two years' notice, and proving that you have performed all your obligations to the league and all your other international obligations, and now we have got you where we want you." What would be the prospect of any other nation agreeing to any amendment that we wanted, and that they did not want, except we gave them a quid pro quo?

Mr. President, as I said yesterday, the stock argument of the good people of this country who think this whole treaty is sacrosanct—this treaty, consisting of 440 articles, which very few people have read, and still fewer understand, including many of us—is, "Granted that there are imperfections and faults in this document, no human document can be expected to be perfect in its origin, but we can amend it after we get in." Have they the slightest conception of what they are talking about? Have they the slightest idea how it can be amended? Do they know that it takes the unanimous consent to such an amendment as we want of every Government which has a representative on the council sitting in Geneva, to wit, nine of them to start with, with the possibility of any self-governing colony of Great Britain sitting on the council also later on? Do they know that? I do not know that they would care if they did know it; but I care, Mr. President. This is the most important series of entangling international obligations that has ever been proposed in the world. Indeed, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] calls it a world constitution, and that is what it is; and he compares this muddy, murky, muddled document of international entanglements and embarrassments to the Constitution of the United States!

Why, Mr. President, is there not a great difference between these two so-called constitutions? We made the Constitution of the United States for ourselves, and we were a fairly homogeneous people under one civilization, which we all understood; and, knowing that human language is always subject to various interpretations, especially where there is a legal fraternity in flourishing condition, we provided that those questions should be settled by our own courts. The provisions of this treaty provide that where there is a difference of opinion it shall be settled by some unknown arbitrators, to be agreed upon, of other nations. Can there be any analogy between two such instruments as those? But, Mr. President, article 26, which is the only article in the covenant which provides for its amendment, the only means by which these admitted defects can be cured, states as follows:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

Upon a casual reading of that, it might occur to some that the council and the assembly themselves had a right to ratify amendments to this league. Of course, a minute's consideration will dispel that illusion, because that would be clearly unconstitutional under our Constitution, for it would be an attempt to make a treaty or to amend a treaty otherwise than by the method provided by our own Constitution. So that what this must mean, in my opinion, is that the members of the league are the parties who amend this constitution, and the members of the league acting by their own Governments in the exercise of their treaty-making power.

What it says is that "amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members." Well, how do the amendments originate? The makers of our Constitution were careful to provide how amendments to our Constitution should originate and how they should be acted upon. They provided that they must originate by one method, by two-thirds of both branches of Congress recommending them to the several States, who could act upon them as Congress prescribed, either by their legislatures, three-quarters being necessary to validate, or by State conventions. There was a sane and orderly method of originating an amendment. Who originates amendments under this article? It is all left blank. Within what time are they to become effective? It is all left blank.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator is one of the most acute lawyers in this body and is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He has been studying this treaty, with his associates, for a number of weeks, if not months. The committee, as I understand it, has submitted a few reservations and a few amendments. The point which the Senator is just now discussing, if I understand the reservations and amendments tendered by the committee, apparently was not deemed of sufficient importance to warrant elucidation by the committee or to warrant them in recommending any amendment, reservation, or interpretation. Does not the Senator think that in the statement he just made, that this document is "muddy, murky, and muddled," he was giving himself too much to alliteration and not sufficiently to verbal accuracy?

I have read the reservations and amendments reported by the committee, and, as I understand them, they have touched but a very few points in the treaty. If the treaty is so "muddy, muddled, and murky," and is so incomprehensible, why has not the Senator, with his able associates, those who are opposed to the treaty, made some further amendments or reservations?

I repeat, the number suggested have been few, indicating that the committee do not regard the treaty as being so defective or improper as to require numerous changes. Why should the Senator now think that the clause which he is just reading is subject to criticism? The signatories to the treaty have a right, by the terms of the instrument, to make amendments. Who makes the amendments? Why, the signatories. How do the signatories act? We act through the Congress; Great Britain acts through her Parliament; France acts through her legislative body; Italy acts through her legislative body in connection with her sovereign. Why should the Senator feel that the article which he is now discussing is susceptible of misconstruction or is not clear—clear as the sun to the humblest one, to say nothing of the acute mind of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has made a very eloquent, although irrelevant, speech, and has asked quite a series of questions in the course of it; and I am at a loss either to answer them as he asked them or to take the more important first.

In answer to the question of the Senator as to why the committee did not produce more amendments and reservations than they did, I will state that it was not owing to any lack of capacity by the committee to have proposed more. A great many of them thought that a great many more were necessary. I assume that before this discussion ends a good many more of the murky and muddled paragraphs of this treaty will be commented upon than this one, though I doubt if any one of them is more murky and muddled than this one. But, Mr. President, whether or not the committee noticed the point to which I have alluded I do not know. If the Senator thinks this is a perfectly clear provision for amendment, he has a right to his opinion; but I think it is not clear, because, as I stated just before I was interrupted by the Senator, it does not say who may propose amendments or how they shall be proposed. All it states is that they may be made, and that they will take effect when ratified by the members.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. FALL. May I not suggest to the Senator that one of the reasons why the committee proposed no further amendments is very well illustrated by the fact that the Senator who has just asked the questions has walked away from his seat, and is now occupying the seat of the Vice President, so that he can not speak or answer or explain his questions. May I not also suggest to the Senator that there were other amendments, notice of which was given to the committee, and which will be suggested for the Senator's consideration on the floor; and, of course, I have no doubt that his conclusions as to the further amendments will be exactly the same as to those that are offered already—in other words, he will not find them apropos or necessary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President; and if a point be well taken on the floor, it is no answer to its merits to say, "Why did not somebody think of it before?" If that were so, it would preclude all amendments being offered on the floor of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, I call attention to the conditions under which this committee were laboring. This document, which had taken six or seven months to prepare, was sent to our committee with very little information concerning it. When we asked for the procès-verbaux, which recounted the arguments and the proceedings of the gentlemen who finally compiled the document, we were told there was a confidential agreement between the parties to the conference not to reveal such information.

When we passed several resolutions in the Senate asking for other documents which we thought would shed light upon some of the recondite or obscure parts of this instrument we were met with the response that it was against public policy or that the archives were still reposing in Paris, and we had very little information, Mr. President. But even while we were trying to perform the duty which the Senate had confided to us under the Constitution a large part of the press of the country and a large number of the people of the country, stirred up by the League to Enforce Peace and other conservators of the American people, were demanding daily that we should report this matter right out; that it had all been agreed upon by the greatest minds in the world, all but one of which were foreign, and it was almost sacrilege to touch it or even to think about it; that it was all right; and there was no reason why the United States Senate, which was the only body which represented the American people in this transaction, should concern itself about it, except that the Constitution did require action by the Senate, and therefore they said, "Get through it as quickly as you can, but do not talk about it and quibble about it." I believe they talked about the Senate debates and our inquiries about it as quibbling.

So when it was intimated that we were proposing any reservations or amendments, they all said that was to wreck the whole treaty; that no amendment or reservation would be proposed in good faith, because the ulterior design was political and partisan; it was mere dislike of the gentleman who was all-powerful in negotiating the 440 articles; and that we must not question it at all, but put it right through.

What amendments and reservations we did bring out are now being opposed by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, opposed irrespective of merit or the necessity of the reservations or the amendments, on the ground that they would have to be submitted to the contracting parties to get their consent. Of course, they will have to be submitted to them to agree to, and they can be agreed to in five minutes. Every chancery in Europe is keeping track of exactly what amendments and what reservations are proposed and the chances of their being adopted. They all know now whether they will agree to them or not, and they could say so in one day; but we are asked to abandon the only chance we have of ever amending the treaty and to take a chance on amending it after we have gotten in, when there is no reason whatever why the others should agree to anything we ask unless they want to do it.

How would anybody propose an amendment to this covenant? I can imagine that when the shoe begins to pinch upon us the President might draw up an amendment and propose it, as he signed the treaty, in his own right and behalf, and send it to the King of Hejaz, who might put it in his breachclout, or send it to the gentleman who presides over Liberia or Haiti, and after it had been rescued from those jungles, if it was rescued, if they favored it they might send it to India. An amendment, an anonymous paper, originating from nowhere, but being called into space, travels an unknown circuit around the inner circles provided for by this labyrinthian covenant, and there is no provision in the covenant as to its ultimate destination. It does not provide that amendments proposed shall be submitted to the inner council or to the assembly of the league. It does not provide that the Congress shall approve such amendments or shall authorize their presentation. It leaves the whole matter in the dark, as it was probably intended to be left in the dark, for the object is to freeze this treaty into immutability, just as it is to freeze the boundaries of every nation into immutability, and then to wish upon us the guaranty of that frozen situation in the universe forever.

Mr. President, the United States of America has a pretty well educated population, and aside from those who have become, shall I say neurotic, by the psychology of the war, I think the sober second thought of this Nation is gradually reasserting itself. I believe it is the opinion of the country that now is our time to look before we leap, and now is the time to remedy such defects as we see in this instrument. I do not believe that the people of the country want the Senate of the United States, which the fathers made the equal partner of the President of the United States in the treaty-making function, to abandon their function, but I believe they want them to exercise their best judgment in this matter.

Of course, it is our duty to listen to our constituents; but, Mr. President, you will find that most constituents who write you about this matter are sure that they are in the majority; whatever each one thinks, he is sure that he represents the great majority of the people of his State. There is no question but that public opinion is divided upon this matter, and the duty of a Senator, as I regard it, is, after hearing all the arguments on both sides and getting all the information he can, to vote not as many of us are accused of doing, for partisan purposes or personal likes or dislikes, but to vote upon this tremendous new course upon which the country is asked to embark with due deliberation, without respect to his own future, and according to his best judgment under his oath of office.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask that the reading of the treaty may be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the treaty.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Article 77.

"The German Government undertakes to pay over to the French Government such proportion of all reserves accumulated by the Empire or by public or private bodies dependent upon it, for the purposes of disability and old age insurance, as would fall to the disability and old age insurance fund at Strasburg.

"The same shall apply in respect of the capital and reserve accumulated in Germany falling legitimately to other social insurance funds, to miners' superannuation funds, to the fund of the railways of Alsace-Lorraine, to other superannuation organisations established for the benefit of the personnel of public administrations and institutions operating in Alsace-Lorraine, and also in respect of the capital and reserves due by the insurance fund of private employees at Berlin, by reason of engagements entered into for the benefit of insured persons of that category resident in Alsace-Lorraine.

"A special Convention shall determine the conditions and procedure of these transfers.

"Article 78.

"With regard to the execution of judgments, appeals and prosecutions, the following rules shall be applied:

"(1) All civil and commercial judgments which shall have been given since August 3, 1914, by the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine between Alsace-Lorrainers, or between Alsace-Lorrainers and foreigners, or between foreigners, and which shall not have been appealed from before November 11, 1918, shall be regarded as final and susceptible of immediate execution without further formality.

"When the judgment has been given between Alsace-Lorrainers and Germans or between Alsace-Lorrainers and subjects of the allies of Germany, it shall only be capable of execution after the issue of an exequatur by the corresponding new tribunal in the restored territory referred to in Article 51.

"(2) All judgments given by German Courts since August 3, 1914, against Alsace-Lorrainers for political crimes or misdemeanors shall be regarded as null and void.

"(3) All sentences passed since November 11, 1918, by the Court of the Empire at Leipzig on appeals against the decisions of the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine shall be regarded as null and void and shall be so pronounced. The papers in regard to the cases in which such sentences have been given shall be returned to the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine concerned.

"All appeals to the Court of the Empire against decisions of the Courts of Alsace-Lorraine shall be suspended. The papers shall be returned under the aforesaid conditions for transfer without delay to the French Cour de Cassation, which shall be competent to decide them.

"(4) All prosecutions in Alsace-Lorraine for offences committed during the period between November 11, 1918, and the coming into force of the present Treaty will be conducted under German law except in so far as this has been modified by decrees duly published on the spot by the French authorities.

"(5) All other questions as to competence, procedure or administration of justice shall be determined by a special Convention between France and Germany.

"Article 79.

"The stipulations as to nationality contained in the Annex hereto shall be considered as of equal force with the provisions of the present Section.

"All other questions concerning Alsace-Lorraine which are not regulated by the present Section and the Annex thereto or by the general provisions of the present Treaty will form the subject of further conventions between France and Germany.

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 80, after the word "Allied," to strike out the word "and Associated," so as to read "and the Principal Allied Powers."

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

"Section VII.

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 81, after the word "Allied" to strike out the words "and Associated," so as to read "by the Principal Allied powers."

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 86, after the word "Allied," to strike out the word "and Associated," so as to read "with the Principal Allied Powers."

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

"Section VIII.

"POLAND.

"Article 87.

"Germany, in conformity with the action already taken by the Allied and Associated Powers, recognizes the complete independence of Poland, and renounces in her favour all rights and title over the territory bounded by the Baltic Sea, the eastern frontier of Germany as laid down in Article 27 of Part II (Boundaries of Germany) of the present Treaty up to a point situated about 2 kilometres to the east of Lorzendorf, then a line to the acute angle which the northern boundary of Upper Silesia makes about 3 kilometres north-west of Simmenau, then the boundary of Upper Silesia to its meeting point with the old frontier between Germany and Russia, then this frontier to the point where it crosses the course of the Niemen, and then the northern frontier of East Prussia as laid down in Article 28 of Part II aforesaid.

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 87, after the word "Allied," to strike out the words "and Associated," so as to read "by the Allied Powers."

The Secretary read as follows:

"Article 88.

It shall take all steps which it thinks proper to ensure the freedom, fairness, and secrecy of the vote. It shall be assisted by German and Danish technical advisers chosen by it from among the local population. Its decisions will be taken by a majority.

"One half of the expenses of the Commission and of the expenditure occasioned by the plebiscite shall be paid by Germany.

"(2). The right to vote shall be given to all persons, without distinction of sex, who:

"(a) Have completed their twentieth year at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty; and

"(b) Were born in the zone in which the plebiscite is taken, or have been domiciled there since a date before January 1, 1900, or had been expelled by the German authorities without having retained their domicile there.

"Every person will vote in the commune (Gemeinde) where he is domiciled or of which he is a native.

"Military persons, officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the German army, who are natives of the zone of Schleswig in which the plebiscite is taken, shall be given the opportunity to return to their native place in order to take part in the voting there.

"(3). In the section of the evacuated zone lying to the north of a line, from East to West (shown by a red line on map No. 4 which is annexed to the present Treaty):

"passing south of the island of Alsen and following the median line of Flensburg Fjord,

"leaving the fjord about 6 kilometres north of Flensburg and following the course of the stream flowing past Kupfermühle upstream to a point north of Niehuus,

"passing north of Pattburg and Ellund and south of Fröslee to meet the eastern boundary of the Kreis of Tondern at its junction with the boundary between the old jurisdictions of Slogs and Kjær (Slogs Herred and Kjær Herred),

"following the latter boundary to where it meets the Scheidebek, following the course of the Scheidebek (Alte Au), Süder Au and Wied Au downstream successively to the point where the latter bends northwards about 1,500 metres west of Ruttebüll,

"thence, in a west-north-westerly direction to meet the North Sea north of Sieltoft,

"thence, passing north of the island of Sylt,

"the vote above provided for shall be taken within a period not exceeding three weeks after the evacuation of the country by the German troops and authorities.

"The result will be determined by the majority of votes cast in the whole of this section. This result will be immediately communicated by the Commission to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and proclaimed.

"If the vote results in favour of the reincorporation of this territory in the Kingdom of Denmark, the Danish Government in agreement with the Commission will be entitled to effect its occupation with their military and administrative authorities immediately after the proclamation.

"(4) In the section of the evacuated zone situated to the south of the preceding section and to the north of the line which starts from the Baltic Sea 13 kilometres from Flensburg and ends north of the islands of Oland and Langeness, the vote will be taken within a period not exceeding five weeks after the plebiscite shall have been held in the first section.

"The result will be determined by communes (Gemeinden), in accordance with the majority of the votes cast in each commune (Gemeinde)."

The next amendment was, on page 157, in two places, after the word "Allied," to strike out "and Associated," so as to read "the Principal Allied Powers."

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

"Article 110.

"Pending a delimitation on the spot, a frontier line will be fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers according to a line based on the result of the voting, and proposed by the International Commission, and taking into account the particular geographical and economic conditions of the localities in question.

"From that time the Danish Government may effect the occupation of these territories with the Danish civil and military authorities, and the German Government may reinstate up to the said frontier line the German civil and military authorities whom it has evacuated.

"Germany hereby renounces definitely in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all rights of sovereignty over the territories situated to the north of the frontier line fixed in accordance with the above provisions. The Principal Allied and Associated Powers will hand over the said territories to Denmark."

The next amendment was, on page 161, article 110, after the word "Allied," to strike out "and Associated," so as to read "the Principal Allied Powers."

The next amendment was, on page 163, article 110, after the word "Allied," to strike out "and Associated," so as to read "the Principal Allied Powers."

The Secretary resumed the reading, as follows:

"Article 111.

"A Commission composed of seven members, five of whom shall be nominated by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by Denmark, and one by Germany, shall be constituted within fifteen days from the date when the final result of the vote is known, to trace the frontier line on the spot.

"The decisions of the Commission will be taken by a majority of votes and shall be binding on the parties concerned."

The next amendment was, on page 163, article 111, after the word "Allied," to strike out "and Associated," so as to read "the Principal Allied Powers."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that completes the reading of the treaty so far as to include all the so-called Fall amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. So I understand. I move, as in legislative session, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 29, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate September 27, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Out of the fullness of the heart we would praise Thee, our Father in heaven, for life, health, strength, vigor; for our Republic, its incomparable Constitution, its glorious institutions which afford opportunity for progress and happiness; its public schools which open the way for education to the humblest in the land; the home, with its happiness and tender affections; its glorious religion which sweeps away all barriers between Thee and the individual; the hopes of the now; promises of the future under the leadership of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, with House amendments thereto disagreed to by the Senate, and that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 641, with House amendments thereto disagreed to by the Senate, and that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. ESCH, Mr. HAMILTON, and Mr. SIMS.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2610. An act to provide for the disposal of certain waste and drainage water from the Yuma project, Arizona.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2610. An act to provide for the disposal of certain waste and drainage water from the Yuma project, Arizona; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week I spoke in the House on the industrial unrest throughout our country. Resolutions have been passed by the United Labor Conference at Youngstown, Ohio, condemning that speech. I have those resolutions and my answer thereto. It will take only a few minutes to read them, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks how much time?

Mr. COOPER. It will not take more than five or six minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for six minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. I ask that the resolutions and my reply thereto be read in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, they will be read in the gentleman's time. Does the gentleman wish the article from the newspaper read.

Mr. COOPER. The resolution passed by the council and my reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

As a result of his attack in Congress on W. Z. Foster, Congressman JOHN G. COOPER was referred to as a "nonunion card man" by S. T. Hammersmark, secretary in the Youngstown office of the American Federation of Labor, at the Wednesday evening meeting of the Mahoning County central labor body.

"In his three terms in Congress," said Hammersmark, "he has not introduced a single labor measure and has opposed all labor measures presented by other Representatives."

Following considerable discussion of COOPER's attack on Foster, secretary of the international committee for the organization of the iron and steel workers the following resolution was presented and adopted:

"Whereas Hon. JOHN G. COOPER, Representative from the nineteenth congressional district of the State of Ohio, in which Youngstown and vicinity is included, did publicly state on the floor of the United States House of Representatives that the leaders in the campaign to organize the workers in the iron and steel industry were of dangerous, radical tendencies, and especially mentioning William Z. Foster, and attributed proclivities to him which would mark him as being unfit and dangerous for the task he is performing; and

"Whereas the said William Z. Foster was selected by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and his work has met the approval of the 24 international unions supporting this movement, and the campaign has been conducted by him in an American and efficient manner in the face of the denial of free speech and assemblage which has been repeatedly and continuously encountered; and

"Whereas the American labor movement has voted approval of his actions in this campaign and his standing in the labor movement is unquestioned; and

"Whereas the statements of Congressman COOPER have caused misunderstandings that threaten to discredit the objects of this movement in the minds of the public, and the sole indictment brought was secured from a publication written more than 10 years past, in the days of free speech and press, which in no way reflects upon this campaign: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the delegates to this body here assembled go on record as decrying this overdrawn and uncalled-for action on the part of Congressman COOPER and hereby express their disapproval of his criticism of the campaign to organize the workers in the iron and steel industry; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Congressman COOPER, the United States Senators from Ohio, and that copies be given the press for publication."

SEPTEMBER 27, 1919.

Mr. HARRY DECHEND,
Secretary Mahoning County Central Labor Congress,
Youngstown, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to reported action of the Mahoning County Central Labor Congress in adopting a resolution disapproving my address to the United States Congress warning American workingmen against radical, revolutionary leadership. Without waiting to receive a formal copy of the resolutions, I am writing to you, inclosing a copy of my speech, and request that out of fairness to all concerned you not only have this letter read to the central labor body, but that you also have my speech read, as it is not long.

Relative to my warning, I want to call your attention to the fact that for the last several months prominent labor leaders have repeatedly come before committees of Congress and stated that they feared it would be impossible to hold radicalism in check. The day after I made the speech in question Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, made this statement to a Senate committee:

"The disposition toward radicalism is so great now that democracy is sneered at by certain groups, who say that it is only a pretext which the employing classes hold up to cheat workers, and that workers can only secure justice by revolution."

I assert that this statement by Mr. Gompers himself justifies my action to any fair man.

I note that your resolution comes to the defense of William Z. Foster, whom I pointed out as the type of radical against whom I wished to warn the workers. Regarding Foster I wish to say that Mr. Gompers admits this man was an I. W. W. and the author of the revolutionary pamphlet "Syndicalism," but claims that Foster has been converted to labor-union principles. In this connection I quote from a letter written by Foster in 1911, now on file in the office of the United States district attorney in Chicago, in which Foster said:

"I am satisfied from my observation that the only way for an I. W. W. to have the workers adopt and practice the principles of revolutionary unionism, which I take is its mission, is to give up the attempt to create a new labor movement, turn itself into a propaganda league, get into the organized-labor movement, and by building up better fighting machines within the old unions than those possessed by our reactionary enemies, revolutionize these unions, even as our French syndicalist fellow workers have so successfully done."

This letter was signed, "Yours for the revolution, William Z. Foster."

It seems that Foster has actually carried into effect his purpose to get into the organized-labor movement, for he is secretary-treasurer of the national committee to organize the steel workers, but I for one shall continue to oppose with all the force and power at my command his efforts to overthrow conservative leadership and have the workers adopt and practice the principles of revolutionary unionism.

Your resolutions further say that my statements have caused misunderstandings that threaten to discredit the object of the movement which resulted in the strike of steel workers. I contend that it is Foster's statement and record rather than anything that I have said that is likely to have this result.

Your resolutions further state that I criticized the campaign to organize the workers of the iron and steel industry. As to this all I wish to say is that I never have and never will criticize any movement to organize workers for the purpose of bettering their conditions, but that I always have and always will support measures for the true benefit of the workingmen.

I note that at the meeting which adopted the resolutions above referred to an attack was made upon me by one S. T. Hammersmark. I know most of the men who have been prominent in labor circles in the Mahoning Valley, but I know nothing about Hammersmark except that he is quoted in the press as the secretary of the local committee in charge of the strike. Evidently Hammersmark has not been in the Mahoning Valley long enough to know the record of the Congressman from that district, for he says:

"In his three terms in Congress Mr. COOPER has opposed all labor measures."

I charge that this statement by Hammersmark is absolutely false, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show. During my service in Congress there have been considered among others five important measures in which labor was vitally interested. These were the child-labor law, Burnett immigration law, compensation for injured Government employees, Adamson eight-hour law for railroad employees, and the Nolan minimum-wage bill for Government employees. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that I not only voted for these measures on a record roll call, but that I also took the floor and spoke in support of them.

Very truly, yours,

_____.

During the reading of the foregoing, the time of Mr. COOPER having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended three minutes.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES IN THE FAR EAST.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short account of my personal experiences in the Far East, together with some observations in Shantung.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting his observations on the Far East and Shantung. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, are these the observations of the gentleman himself?

Mr. ACKERMAN. They are.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SYNOPSIS OF PROCEDURE IN THE HOUSE.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a report from the Committee on Rules and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a report from the Committee on Rules. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 306, submit a report on said resolution, with the following amendments:

In line 2, striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "fifteen."

In paragraph 2, striking out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9.

The committee recommend that the resolution, with these amendments, be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 306.

Resolved, That there shall be printed and bound for the use of the House 500 copies of "A Synopsis of Procedure in the House of Representatives," by Clarence A. Cannon, parliamentary clerk of the House, to be distributed to Members by the Speaker.

That a revised edition of 500 copies of the same shall be printed subsequent to the publication of the revised edition of Hinds's Precedents, to be distributed in like manner.

That the author shall receive no compensation for his services in the preparation or publication of the same.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 2 strike out the word "five" and insert the word "fifteen."

In paragraph 2 strike out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may we have the Clerk report the lines proposed to be stricken out?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the lines proposed to be stricken out.

The CLERK. The lines proposed to be stricken out are as follows:

That a revised edition of 500 copies of the same shall be printed subsequent to the publication of the revised edition of Hinds's Precedents, to be distributed in like manner.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution as amended authorizes the printing of 1,500 copies of a synopsis of procedure in the House of Representatives by the present efficient parliamentary clerk at the Speaker's desk. The parliamentary clerk is retiring from that position on the 1st of October, and is offering to give to the Members of the House this memorandum of House procedure for their convenience.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state in just what shape this document is to be printed?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It will be in vest-pocket form, for the convenience and use of the Members of the House.

Mr. WALSH. This is not a resolution providing for bringing Hinds' Precedents down to date?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; this has nothing whatever to do with that. The resolution, however, as originally introduced, provided that this vest-pocket memorandum of House procedure should be revised after Hinds' Precedents had been brought down to date. It is proposed that Mr. Cannon bring Hinds' Precedents down to date; but that, however, will be done independently of this resolution. The Committee on Rules thought it wise enough to strike out the provision for the republication of this memorandum of procedure in the House after Hinds' Precedents had been brought down to date.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the volume will be of the same size and about half the thickness of the vest-pocket directory.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is my understanding.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. WALSH. The purpose being to have the rules of procedure in a convenient form for the Members, that they may have them in their pockets and not have to send for the manual?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the purpose of the resolution. In the old days, when Members had desks, each Member of the House could have conveniently at hand copies of the manual and rules of the House. Now it is necessary to send to the Speaker's desk or elsewhere to get a copy of the manual, and it is sometimes a source of inconvenience.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Is this vest-pocket edition to bring Hinds' Precedents down to date?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; this is not for the purpose of bringing Hinds' Precedents down to date, but it is to contain the rules of procedure in the House for the convenient use of Members. Hinds' Precedents will be brought down to date at a later time.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this include any decisions later than Hinds' edition?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is a vest-pocket edition of the rules of the House and not of Hinds' Precedents.

Mr. DOWELL. It has no reference to the decisions under the rules?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Probably there are references to decisions, but no comments or lengthy decisions, because it is to be a very small vest-pocket memoranda edition of the rules and procedure of the House.

Mr. DOWELL. It has nothing to do with the decisions, but is merely a copy of the rules of the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; to a certain extent.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. With pleasure.

Mr. GARRETT. I will say that this thought has occurred to me since we considered this matter in the Committee on Rules this morning: This has a provision for the distribution of these documents. It provides that they shall be distributed by the Speaker. I do not know whether that would put a burden on the Speaker's force to undertake to distribute them. Ordinarily we have such documents distributed through the document or the folding room. Of course, they can be carried to the Speaker's office and Members can go and get them there. He can have them piled up in his room, and with the clerical force they can be distributed. If we send them to the document room, of course, they would be for the public generally, but if they went to the folding room they will be available for each Member.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose of having the edition distributed from the Speaker's room was to avoid putting them either in the folding room or the document room, because they are for the sole use of the Members of the House. It might be that they could be placed in the office of the Clerk and distributed by the Clerk. I think the resolution was prepared in the Speaker's office, and I think it is entirely agreeable to the force in the Speaker's office.

Mr. GARRETT. Then, of course, it is satisfactory. The thing that occurred to me was that we might be putting a burden on the force in the Speaker's office when we have other agents provided for taking care of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand it is agreeable to the force in the Speaker's office to distribute this booklet.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. GARD. Is it understood as to what proportion each individual shall have?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There will be about three for each Member. There are 435 Members, and we are providing for 1,500 copies. Of course, some may be lost.

Mr. GARD. Is it to be a copy of the rules of procedure, such as we have now in the vest-pocket directory?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I understand, while I have not seen a copy as it has been prepared, I understand that it relates to the procedure in the House, a sort of synopsis of the rules of the House.

Mr. GARD. Is it supposed to contain memoranda with authorities cited by the parliamentarian?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Authorities will be cited.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. As I understand the rule and the resolution, if adopted, the Members will obtain copies without going to any office to apply for them, and therefore we are sure of our quota without any action on our part.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They will be mailed from the Speaker's office to the Members of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When will the supplement to Hinds' Precedents be available?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the work is to be begun immediately by Mr. Cannon. That will have to be done by a resolution by the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I make the inquiry because they ought to be printed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The resolution has not yet been introduced, but it should be introduced at a very early day. It will take probably a year before the work is completed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many volumes will it comprise?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no knowledge of the number of volumes it will take. I am told by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that it will probably take two volumes. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield for a moment, I have a vest-pocket edition of the directory in my hand that contains 40 or 50 pages of the rules of the House of Representatives and an index. Is it the purpose to incorporate those things in another book like this?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Authorities will be cited.

Mr. GARD. The rules reproduced and authorities cited.

Mr. POU. It is a sort of a parliamentary primer.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; a sort of parliamentary primer, so that Members can understand and participate in the procedure of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

COLD-STORAGE BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, the cold-storage bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage food, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this bill come with a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. HAUGEN. It has a unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move——

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a time?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I think will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 210, submit a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 210.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recess which may occur during its sessions, and may meet at such places as said committee deems advisable. Said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, which, when so appointed, are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and take testimony, and to meet at such times and places as said committee shall from time to time direct.

Resolved further, That said Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department may report to the House in one or more reports, as it may deem advisable, the results of its investigations, with such recommendations as it may care to make.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was reported by the Committee on Rules some weeks ago, but on account of the rush of business in the House, the activities of the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and the other work of Congress, consideration was not asked for the resolution. Now the members of that committee are ready to make such investigation as the conditions may warrant in the Treasury Department and I ask for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to inquire of the gentleman, if this rule is passed, will that in any way interfere with the operations of the committee of 14 appointed to investigate the conduct of the war in all its various branches?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand not; that this is rather an audit as was contemplated when the committees were provided for for investigation of the departments of the Government. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

COLD-STORAGE LEGISLATION.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, if agreeable to the House, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Georgia, with a view to fixing the time for general debate?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. We have very limited requests for debate on this side.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will one hour on a side be satisfactory?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Yes; limited to the subject of the bill, I would suggest.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, and I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] and the other hour by myself.

Mr. GARRETT. And debate to be confined to the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is an unusual thing to do.

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, well, the rule that we reported provided that debate should be confined to the bill.

Mr. HICKS. But the rule was not adopted. We are taking up the bill by unanimous consent and the rule does not apply. There is no rule applying now, as I understand it.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that any unanimous consent has been given to take up the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. Unanimous consent had not been given for limiting debate.

Mr. BLANTON. But the unanimous consent was asked over the hip-pocket document which the chairman of the Committee on Rules had at that time ready.

Mr. WALSH. That is a Texas brand of facetiousness.

Mr. GARRETT. Confine debate to the bill and let us get through with this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9521), and pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE]. Is there objection?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to say this: A rule was prepared to be brought in here, and that rule confines this debate to one hour on a side, and the debate is to be confined to the subject matter of the bill; and it was our understanding that is what would be done when we gave unanimous consent without bringing in this rule. The gentleman therefore ought to make that request to confine debate to the subject matter of the bill and let us take up the bill itself—that is what we are interested in—and pass it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request to make it apply to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of debate be limited to two hours, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Georgia, and the debate to be limited to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, the cold-storage bill, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I object. I think the bill ought to be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will discontinue the further reading of the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill be read for amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill of considerable importance, as I understand it, and I would be very glad if the chairman or some other member of the committee would give us a preliminary explanation.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would be glad to do it if we could agree on the time for general debate, but it does not seem necessary that we should consume all the afternoon in general debate as long as there are hardly any requests for time. I have not had any requests until just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for one hour.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield.

Mr. RUBEY. It might be a good idea to take up the bill under the five-minute rule and discuss it then instead of under general debate. I think gentlemen will not object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To see if we can not get an agreement relative to debate on this bill.

Mr. GARRETT. You can not get that in the Committee of the Whole. Let them read it under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] claim the floor?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will hold the floor, but my understanding is that when we read the bill under the five-minute rule we can arrange for debate then.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, under the rule the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is recognized for an hour, is he not?

The CHAIRMAN. He is.

Mr. GARD. And does the gentleman from Iowa mean to inform us that we are not to have any discussion of the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON].

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. HAUGEN. Fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I want to state that the Committee on Agriculture has worked hard and given serious thought to the question covered by this bill, and I am convinced that the enactment of this measure will do much to reduce the high cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, when I first began to study the cold-storage question I did not think it would develop into such a gigantic problem. Knowing something about the New Jersey law, I thought it would be rather an easy task to extend its provisions and give like power and authority to the Government. I made an attempt at this when I prepared and introduced my first bill, H. R. 7970, but soon discovered that the question of State rights prevented the absolute control and supervision of the cold-storage warehouses by the Federal Government, and if the Government had any rights at all they were in the commodity to be stored in such places, and then only in so much of that commodity as entered into interstate commerce.

Of course, a system of taxation for revenue would have made it possible to get a record of and at the same time regulate and control any or all articles of food placed in cold storage. But the country generally is opposed to the use of the taxing power, especially when it can be avoided, and at this time, when every effort is being made to reduce the cost of living, such a method would be offensive, because naturally it would add to the cost of the article stored.

A study of the food situation from the producer to the consumer revealed the fact that of the amount placed in cold storage approximately 90 per cent entered into interstate commerce either going to or from storage, and, therefore, it was decided that the most logical method of handling the problem would be from that angle rather than the taxing system.

As the object of this bill is the control and regulation of food and food products it was thought wise to designate the Department of Agriculture as the agency best suited for carrying out its provisions, and with the assistance of and suggestions from the legal division of that department we have prepared this bill.

To my surprise I found that more than one-half of the States have no laws governing the cold storage of food, and in some States having laws frequently such laws are prepared to suit the convenience of that particular State. As an instance of this kind, the State of Delaware has a fairly good law, but exempts the commodities in which they are largely interested, fish and fruits. The State of New York, which has more food in storage than any other State, permits under its law anyone to rent a space or private box in a warehouse and to keep his produce or food as private property without the necessity of reporting the same. Recently the authorities recommended a change in their law to remedy this condition so as to bring under the control of the State all food held in storage regardless of ownership.

This information was brought out during the hearings before our committee when the following statement was made by Mr. Floyd M. Shoemaker, president of the New York State Cold Storage Association, and president of the Hygea Refrigeration Co., of Elmira, N. Y., chairman of the cold-storage subdivision of the American Warehousemen's Association. On page 250 of the hearings Mr. Horne asked Mr. Shoemaker:

Will you refer to the suggestions recently made by the commissioner with respect to amendments?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes; I intended to do that. That deals especially with the cold-storage law of our State.

I read in one of yesterday's papers that it has been recommended in a report to Gov. Smith that there be recommendations made by him for certain changes in our State law, which may profitably be considered by you gentlemen in framing a Federal law.

The principal item of interest in this recommendation by Commissioner Porter is that an act be formulated to provide for the marking of the date in and out on packages of cold-storage products from what we now know as private warehouses, warehouses where the goods moving in and out are owned strictly by the individual who owns the warehouse or owns the storage box, as the case may be, by rental, lease, or otherwise. Heretofore, in our State, those goods have not been subject to the marking regulations that apply to the public cold-storage warehouse.

Mr. VOIGT. Pardon me, but do not the private cold-storage warehouses come under your law at all?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. No, sir; not what are known as "private boxes"; they are not obliged to stamp their goods at the time they go in, and it is difficult to determine how long such goods stay in those cold-storage places.

Mr. VOIGT. Well, if your cold-storage law does not apply to private warehouses, the owners of them can hold their goods in storage indefinitely?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Well, the character of the goods themselves would prevent any such measure as you suggest. That point has been very thoroughly gone over in previous discussions.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Are they local goods or are they interstate goods?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Well, they may be both.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. They may be both?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes. The commissioner of foods and markets also speaks of the provision for disposal of foods that have been in storage more than the 12 months' limit. He proposes that an amendment be made to the present law to apply to private as well as public cold storages. This covers the recommendations of the commissioner on the points referred to.

The commissioner of our State and the warehousemen of our State are definitely on record as favoring an adequate and reasonable Federal cold-storage act. We believe that this is the proper way of regulating the interchange of foodstuffs between States.

Most of the States realize the necessity of uniform cold-storage laws, and throughout the country many governors are considering the calling of special sessions of their respective legislatures for this purpose. I understand the call has already been issued in Michigan and Virginia.

When the first bill, H. R. 7970, providing for a Federal cold-storage law was introduced on July 29 by myself, the press of the country immediately commented favorably on the plan and suggested that Government regulation and supervision of the cold-storage warehouse would solve, at least in part, the high-cost-of-living problem. On August 8 our President, in addressing Congress, followed up this suggestion, urging that the matter be given consideration and earnestly recommended the passage of a law providing for Federal regulation of cold-storage warehouses.

The importance of legislation of this character must be apparent to all. With 48 separate States, each having a different law or no law, it will be seen that the food situation can be handled and controlled, for good or bad purposes, through the States having the least restrictions.

Under the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917, the Government has more authority than we could possibly give or it would be wise to grant in peace times, and yet with that law still in operation there are just being discovered vast quantities of food, some of which has been hoarded and stored until unfit for use, while prevailing prices, due to a supposed shortage of food, are higher than at any period of our existence.

In my own State of New Jersey, where we are supposed to have a model law, there have recently been discovered 55,000 pounds of fish unfit for use, all of which has been in storage over a year, and the records show that some of it has been stored for more than two years. The retail price of fresh fish of the kind found for the week ending August 23 averaged 40 cents per pound.

In this connection I should like the Clerk to read in my time an article from the Trenton Evening Times, of Trenton, N. J.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Trenton Evening Times, Trenton, N. J., Aug. 22, 1919.]

TONS OF BAD FISH WILL BE DESTROYED—COMPANY ADMITS 55,000 POUNDS IN STORAGE UNFIT FOR HUMAN CONSUMPTION.

Representatives of the Bay State Fish Co. did not appear before the State department of health to-day, as cited to do so, to show cause why 55,000 pounds of fish "unfit for human consumption," owned by the company and stored at Seaside Heights, should not be confiscated by the State. A letter from B. F. Sparks, of Philadelphia, the agent of the Bay State Co., informed the department that he had no objection to make to the confiscation, and he admitted that the fish were unfit for human use.

Attorney General Thomas F. McCran will apply to the judge of the Ocean County circuit court for an order to confiscate the fish for the State, and after this order has been allowed the fish will be taken and disposed of, possibly for fertilizer, and the proceeds of the proceeding will go into the State treasury.

The fish in question have been stored in the plant of the Barnegat Power & Cold Storage Co. for more than a year, in violation of the State law. Some of the supply had been stored in cold-storage plants in other States before being placed in the Barnegat plant.

The attorney general announced to-day that he will confer with District Attorney Joseph L. Bodine next Tuesday for the purpose of determining whether or not the Bay State Co. is guilty of violation of the Lever Act against hoarding of food.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. You will notice that the authorities of our State have taken the matter up with the Department of Justice for the purpose of determining whether the owners of this food are guilty of hoarding under the food-control act, but if the Food Administration and the Department of Justice had performed their duties under that law there is every reason to believe that the food now wasted and destroyed would have been saved and long since gone into human consumption.

When a condition like this can exist in a State operating under what is termed a model law, what must be the situation in the States having no laws?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The suggestion the gentleman makes is that the Lever law has not been enforced with respect to the hoarding of food.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. There is no question about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would appear so in this instance. Now, the gentleman proposes to have the Department of Agriculture take up the question where the Department of Justice apparently left off. Does he think he will get any better results under the Department of Agriculture than he would under the Department of Justice?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We hope so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman is hopeful, because we have been increasing the appropriations for the Department of Justice for various purposes, and apparently for the purpose of reducing the high cost of living, but up to date the high cost of living does not seem to have come down. Does the gentleman know of any prosecutions that have been recently made by the Attorney General's department?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Not until after the first bill was introduced relative to cold storage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks that the introduction of the cold-storage bill had something to do with the activities of the Department of Justice?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That seems to be the impression.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether, in view of the fact that large appropriations have recently been made to the Department of Justice for the detection of bomb throwers, any bomb throwers have been caught recently?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I do not know about that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman's hopefulness is correct, and that we may get results from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The people of the State of New York, many of them, are very much interested in this bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman if in his calculation he has determined upon any per cent of saving in the high cost of living that will accrue from this bill, and if he has calculated upon or made an estimate of about the date when the decline by reason of this bill will take effect?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I have made no calculations at all. Before the armistice was signed everybody filled the storage space in the cold-storage warehouses for the purpose of making money, and instead of bringing out what was stored it has been kept in cold storage. They are now unloading the cold-storage warehouses.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will concede it is going to take a considerable amount of money to operate this activity, and he ought to be able to show concretely that there would be actually some saving made to compensate for that additional expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman can take it under the five-minute rule. I ask for the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have not read the bill or looked at the question. I have been very much interested in the explanation.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I think general debate ought to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The impression has gone out that the cold-storage warehouse is a menace to society, but such is not the case, and I am convinced that sentiment is fast changing and the people are beginning to realize that the cold-storage warehouse is the one essential agency to prevent suffering and starvation between the producing and consuming seasons. No nation is seldom more than a year ahead of starvation, for in the plan of nature there is a time for sowing and a time for reaping, and unless the harvest when available is gathered, conserved, and preserved in warehouses specially adapted for the different articles of food, when the nonproducing season arrives there will be no surplus from which we can draw supplies to feed our people.

It is therefore a measure for the protection and security of our country, and to encourage the business of cold storage that a uniform law is asked for and required, for such a law will not only give the Government complete supervision over the food situation of our country, but by the information made available by its provisions the distribution of any abnormal surplus can be regulated and food prices stabilized and reduced.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to explain the bill by sections, during which time I shall be glad to attempt to answer any questions that may be asked.

The title of the bill is self-explanatory and sets forth its object.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman just said he would like to explain the bill by sections. I would be very glad, for one, if he would, because I consider this bill to be of very great importance. But does the gentleman explain how the committee arrived at the arbitrary period of 12 months in section 9 of the bill, which provides a penalty for shipping or selling any article of food that has been kept in cold storage after the expiration of 12 months?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I did not just get the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARD. Why do you fix the time at 12 months? Does not the gentleman think 12 months is rather a long time to provide for articles to be held in cold storage if we want immediately to affect the cost of living and bring the necessary articles of food down in price?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We did not think it was wise to unload all the cold storages. The "12 months" is a season, a year. In other words, it seemed to be the general opinion of those who appeared before our committee that that was the season, 12 months, and we made it that way, so as to provide that any goods could be stored 12 months, from one season to another.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I presume the purpose of fixing 12 months is to allow us to carry a surplus from one crop over to the next crop?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Over to the next season. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. GARD. My inquiry was whether or not the committee had made investigation in that regard through the men who are expert in these lines as to the proper period of cold storage, and if they did make such investigation, what it was and what the result of it showed.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The general opinion in our committee was that it ought to be 12 months.

Mr. GARD. What character of people testified before your committee?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We had all kinds of people, warehousemen and others. The hearings are before you. You can see that they all testified that the time should be 12 months.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is that to include all articles? Here are fish and vegetables, and so on. I think in the case of fish and some other articles it should be a particular time fixed for the cold storage of each, inasmuch as they may be successfully preserved for different periods.

Mr. KNUTSON. Of course the term "crop" that I used was merely a figure of speech. But the gentleman knows that in some years the fishermen take a large catch of herring, for example, or of other fish, and in other years the catch is very small indeed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New Jersey five minutes more?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. GARD. I notice that one of the provisions of this bill uses the term "article of food." That includes liquid food. Is there any provision in the bill prohibiting the storage of milk?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That is liquid food.

Mr. GARD. There is no regulation in this bill as to milk at all?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. No.

Mr. GARD. You can get milk and pile it up 10 years, if it could be kept that long?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. There is not much of it that would keep over four days.

Mr. GARD. I mean milk that is put down in pasteurized form or in powdered form.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Then it would not be liquid milk.

Mr. GARD. I mean milk in cans, condensed milk.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That is not kept in cold storage.

Mr. GARD. Is not that ever kept in cold storage?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. No.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I might say that the deception it aims to prevent does not necessarily mean intentional deception, but deception of any and all kinds with respect to cold-storage foods, much of which has resulted from the lack of a system for the proper control of the cold-storage warehouse rather than willful intention.

Section 1 is simply the name by which the act shall be known, "United States cold-storage act."

Section 2 defines the meaning of the different terms used throughout the act, and removes all question of doubt as to the responsibility of those operating under the act.

Section 3 provides that food going into or shipped from cold storage in commerce shall be marked to show that it is cold-storage food and the date and place when and where it was held in storage, and further provides that if an article of food has not entered into interstate commerce and is removed from cold storage for local consumption before the expiration of 30 days following the date when such article of food was first placed in cold storage the statement that the article is a cold-storage food may be removed.

Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 deal with the marking of articles of food or the containers thereof in storage should it be commercially impracticable to mark such articles in accordance with the requirement, and provides the method to be used and the procedure to be followed in handling such food.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished gentleman yield for a question on that section?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is there any protection in this bill for the ultimate consumer, the man who buys eggs and other products of a retailer, or the man who eats them in a restaurant? Has he any means of determining how long that which he eats has been kept in cold storage?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We have no right to control any eggs after they go out of commerce

Mr. KING. Under this bill?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Under this bill; yes.

Mr. GARD. Referring to the section that the gentleman passed and did not comment on very extensively—I refer to the latter part of section 2 and subdivisions (f) and (c) as they appear on the top of page 3 of the bill, where there is an exception made for the establishment or structure used for the storage of food for the consumption of himself, his family, or guests—I presume that means one's home; and, second, the business of serving meals—I presume that refers to restaurants and hotels; and as to the third, is there any distinction of what is retail business under this act?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. A retail business is a grocery man or anybody that does not store goods in commerce. If the retail grocer or anyone else handles goods in commerce, it will not exempt him.

Mr. GARD. Is a man permitted under this law to have a place, a large cold-storage and refrigerating plant, stocked up with beef or other meat and sell it out by the whole beef or half beef or whole or half of any other slaughtered animal? Would you call that a retail business, or is there any line of distinction between a retail and a wholesale business?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The person who sells to a consumer is a retailer.

Mr. GARD. In any quantity?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes; in any quantity, if he uses it for his own consumption.

Mr. GARD. There is no distinction here.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. There is no distinction here, but that is always understood.

Mr. GARD. I think possibly the bill should be amended so that the definition of what is a retail dealer should be understood and made manifest in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has again expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, how much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Not very much more, unless called upon to answer a lot of questions.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask a question of the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman from Iowa is anxious to get the bill under discussion under the five-minute rule. I do not believe that 5 per cent of the Members outside of the committee know anything about this bill. It is an important bill, and the gentleman from New Jersey seems to be making an intelligent and informing speech. I would be willing for him to go on a full hour if he covers the bill in his explanation. It will save time in the end.

Mr. HAUGEN. My thought was that the discussion had better be confined to this bill, and the quicker we get under the five-minute rule the more headway we will make in the discussion. When we get into debate under the five-minute rule the intention was to ask for time.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, right along that line, I have not read the bill or the hearings. I have got to vote upon the bill, and I think you will save time if you will let the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] go on with his discussion of the bill and give us a general idea of it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, so that we can settle this question of time for debate. I am going to ask in the House for an hour on a side.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] that the committee do now rise.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can the gentleman from New Jersey finish in 10 minutes?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I think so.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey 10 minutes.

Mr. HICKS. As I understand, Mr. Chairman, we are proceeding now under general debate, for which no time has been limited. Anybody who gets the recognition of the Chair can speak for an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. After the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] yields the floor.

Mr. HICKS. Therefore after the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has finished, some other gentleman can get up and speak for an hour, and so on. Therefore we can have all the time we want. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the explanation given by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] is extremely interesting; and if we let the general debate run we can get a better understanding of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HICKS. No; the gentleman from New Jersey gave me permission to speak.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Does the gentleman want to ask me anything more?

Mr. HICKS. No.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Section 8 forbids the altering, mutilating, destroying, obscuring, obliterating, or removal of any mark placed on any article of food or the container thereof in compliance with regulations.

Section 9 limits the period of time to 12 months for which food in commerce may be held in cold storage, and provides that no article of food shall be delivered or shipped in commerce after the expiration of 12 months from the date upon which such article of food was first placed in storage. Exception to the period of storage is made in the case of cheese held for the purpose of ripening and improving the quality thereof.

Section 10, with the idea of conserving food and protecting public health, authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to forbid any warehouseman to receive in commerce any article of food for storage in any warehouse, or to transport in commerce any article of food in a refrigerator vehicle, after such warehouse or refrigerator vehicle is found to be insanitary or otherwise unfit for the storage or transportation of any such article of food.

Mr. CANNON. That applies only to interstate commerce.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. This bill confines itself to interstate commerce. Section 11 is one of the very important sections of the bill in that every warehouseman holding food in cold storage or transporting food in commerce in a refrigerator vehicle is required to keep accurate records and accounts of all such food, and when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit monthly reports, giving full information as to the amounts of all articles of food held in cold storage and in any cooling or chilling room and in all refrigerator vehicles maintained, operated, or controlled by him. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require such other reports and returns as to amounts, ownership, and storage space as may be deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Have we the authority to legislate as this section provides, to require monthly reports, and so forth?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose that in New Jersey food is held in cold storage for State usage or may be used for State consumption and may never go into interstate commerce. Did the committee examine to see whether the Secretary of Agriculture would be authorized to make every warehouse report, as the section provides?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes; we can require that.

Mr. CANNON. Has that been settled by litigation?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We are so advised—that we can get all the information we want.

Mr. CANNON. Whether it ever goes into interstate commerce or not?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That is the report made to us.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Does section 11 apply to the railways? Must they keep these records and report to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. If they are doing the work.

Mr. ACKERMAN. They are transporting.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. If they own the goods.

Mr. ACKERMAN. This does not say if they own the goods. It says every person. It seems to me additional employees may be required.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. They are not warehousemen.

Mr. ACKERMAN. It says every warehouseman and every person transporting.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association owning or transporting the goods. If they are doing it, they must report. Section 12 forbids any person to interfere with any duly authorized agent of the Department of Agriculture in the performance of his duties under this act.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. What does section 12 mean?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. It means that if the Department of Agriculture wants to send an inspector to any warehouse the owner or warehouseman is prohibited from interfering with that man in the performance of his duties. He can go in and examine the warehouse to see whether it is sanitary, and he can inspect the books to see whether the records are right or not, without interference.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Why do you use the term "resist" there?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I do not know about that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I assume that they would not undertake to penalize a man who resorted to any legal remedies which he might have.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Not at all.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It is a rather curious expression, it seems to me, to have in the law.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. If the Secretary of Agriculture wanted to send one of his officers to examine a warehouse, the warehouseman might resist his coming in to see whether the goods were spoiled. It is the object of the section to prevent that.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Was it disclosed in the hearings that any great quantity of food was held over a year in any of these cold storage plants?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. There have been instances where it has been kept for over two years.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In what length of time does food begin to deteriorate when it is kept in cold storage?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. That depends on what kind of food it is.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Meat, for instance?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Meat can be kept frozen for two or three years.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not to be assumed that it is to the advantage of the dealers and warehousemen to get this food out of the warehouses within a year?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. They do not always do it. Take for instance fish. In New York City on April 1 of this year they had nearly 10,000,000 pounds of frozen fish in cold storage.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The administration of section 11, providing for reports, will certainly entail a great deal of expense in the employment of a body of men to keep these accounts and make these reports, for which, of course, the consumer must pay.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. They do it now. They have to do it for the sake of insurance and their fees. They keep all records, and they can furnish them in a short time.

Section 13 contains the penalty for the violation of any provision of the several sections, while section 14 defines what shall constitute and who shall be guilty of such violation.

Section 15 deals with cold storage food offered for shipment to any foreign country and provides that such food shall not be subject to the provisions of this act if the sale and shipment of such food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in such foreign country and not in contravention of the laws of such country. This is a very important feature and practically establishes a standard of quality for our foodstuffs throughout the world and will do much to increase and retain our foreign trade.

Section 16 applies to food offered for importation and provides how such food shall be handled if shipped in commerce in violation of this act.

Section 17 sets forth the legal procedure to be followed with respect to perishable food in commerce when it is found that such food is likely immediately to become unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for food, and provides that such article of food may be proceeded against in any district court of the United States and such disposition made of the food as the court may direct.

The balance of the bill contains the administrative features as well as an appropriation of $50,000 for the carrying out of its provisions, and in view of the urgent demand for immediate legislation of this character I trust the bill will pass in its present form. [Applause.]

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. What will be the effect of this bill, if it passes, on the great quantities of food now in cold storage?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Before 12 months they will have to sell it.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, that would make it about 15 months.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The provision is that if they put any goods in cold storage from another State the time is reckoned from the time they put it in.

Mr. HULINGS. Has the committee taken into consideration any means by which the stock now in cold storage shall be put on the market?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. We have nothing to do with that.

Mr. HAUGEN. That would be under the food-control act. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CANNON. I wish the gentleman from Georgia would yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON].

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, the various railways do the feeding in the Pullman cars. That is my information. I do not understand that the Pullman Co. does the feeding, but the railroad does it and pays a rent for the cars. Now, I am fond of spring chicken, and when I take up the bill of fare and see spring chicken, one-half 75 cents or $1, or whatever it may be, I always ask the question whether it is last spring's chicken or the year before. Well, they say it is spring chicken. I say, "Yes; it might be spring chicken two years ago," and it generally is. [Laughter.] Now, I want to ask the gentleman if this legislation will reach the spring-chicken question? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUTCHINSON. No, sir; the bill does not go as far as that.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I will.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. In the matter of refrigerator cars, the railroads own some and the warehouse corporation owns some.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. How do the provisions of the bill apply to cars owned by the railroads?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The person or individual or corporation who uses the cars will make the report.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 208) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

COLD-STORAGE BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Texas 15 minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCE. The chairman of the committee stated at the opening of the debate that this was the unanimous report from the committee. Am I wrong in understanding that after the chairman of the committee has consumed his time any Member in opposition may obtain the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be the general rule of parliamentary procedure. However, in committee the Chair recognizes Members on the committee in preference to those not on the committee.

Mr. LUCE. Even if the members of the committee are not opposed to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the procedure. The Chair doubts the wisdom of it, but that is the procedure.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think the committee should be under a misapprehension as to the effect of this bill. If there be those here who think that the enactment of this law, this cold-storage act, is going to rapidly reduce the cost of living, they might as well begin to get undeceived at this time. It is not going to do it. The cold-storage business has sprung up in this country only in the past few years. It has been a great development, and it is a business institution that enables our people to store food in the season of production and to hold it against that time when there is no seasonable production.

The springtime is the productive period for eggs, for illustration; but until the cold storage sprung up in this country we had no way of carrying over from the season of production these articles of food so much needed and desired by our people; but through the cold-storage operation we take the superabundance of eggs in the season of production and carry them over to the nonproductive period, and so it goes practically with every article of food.

There is no uniform cold-storage legislation in this country. In 12 or 14 States we have what is known as a uniform cold-storage law, but the greater part of the food in the country passes through interstate commerce, and it was deemed wise and important to the consuming public, as well as to the producing public, that there should be some uniformity of law with reference to this most important proposition. That is what this bill is for, to give that uniformity.

What is in the bill? In the first place we say that the limit of storage shall be 12 months. Some gentleman has asked why make the 12-month limit. We had the experts from the Agricultural Department, we had the experts from the cold-storage concerns all over the country, and from the sum total of the testimony of those experts we find that practically every article of food is both palatable and wholesome after a period of 12 months' storage.

There is something further in addition to this expert testimony. Nature has made some laws. Nature has said to us that there is a 12-months' turnover, has it not? Practically every crop—in fact, every crop—is grown within the 12 months' period. If we enact a statute here dealing with food supplies of the country, and the experts tell us these food supplies can be kept both wholesome and palatable for 12 months, and nature's laws come along and assert themselves, that nature by her spring, summer, fall, and winter makes the seedtime and the reaping time and we are not going to change nature's laws, then we will not go far wrong if we adopt the 12-months' period. Why the necessity for us to adopt the 12-months' period?

I will tell you why: If you adopt a shorter period you are running into a dangerous territory, because the country will have consumed during the productive season the things that we will need in the next productive season and force on the market and starve the people in the next productive season; and it is dangerous to have too short a limitation. Now, why the necessity of the 12 months; why not a greater limitation? I will tell you why: Nature's laws come in again. If you give a longer period than 12 months, you put it in the hands of the cold-storage people and the manipulators of the food supplies of the country to hoard them up—raise the prices and lower them at their sweet will, and the public must pay the bill—but when you put the cold-storage operator, who is in the business for the money, when you put before him a statute that forces the stored product out of storage at the end of 12 months, he knows full well the productive season has rolled around again and he must sell or great loss will be his lot. Hoarding and price manipulation is thus forestalled. He has got gradually to feed this stuff out on the market, and that far it will have some effect upon the markets of the country. No great immediate reduction, however, can be expected in this present high cost of living.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. GARD. I am interested in what the gentleman says about the time of permitting cold storage. For instance, in the committee, what was the concensus of the testimony relating to the storage of eggs? How long are eggs stored, for example?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The testimony showed eggs are both palatable and wholesome at 12 months. You can not detect by taste that there is any change for the worse at the end of 12 months.

Mr. GARD. But the gentleman said a period longer than 12 months would give an opportunity to the profiteer or cold-storage man to either depress or inflate the price of eggs?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Surely.

Mr. GARD. What has been the practice—the average time of storing eggs? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. We have no testimony as to the average time. The figures we have of eggs show that eggs go into cold storage beginning down in Texas along in January or February and then getting up in this country along in June and July, and it mounts up until the July peak is reached—or August, I believe it is—and then it goes gradually down until they are all practically fed out by the next producing period, and then the process begins again. But here is what happens: People who have been interested in this business for the purpose of making money in many instances have withheld food from the market until the food was destroyed.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question simply for information?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is as to whether there is any objection from the fruit interests based either upon the time limitation or upon any particular steps that are necessary under this bill with reference to fruit storage?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. There has been no objection with reference to fruit. Take the case of apples. There would be no necessity of this law in the case of apples, because any child will know when you take an apple from the box whether that apple is a good, sound apple by looking at it. That is not true with meat; it is not true with eggs; but that is true with respect to many things that go into cold storage.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. We have seen a good deal in the press recently as to the time food has been held off the market. What has the testimony disclosed as to the time they have held meats in cold storage, and things like that, the longest period of time?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Well, fish has been kept 27 months, and other things in proportion. I do not remember the details of it, but to be fair to the people, the packers who had their representatives here and other people connected with cold-storage business would bring you a diagram and show you the average figures taken during the productive period. They will draw a chart showing the peak in the productive months, and when that is reached it will go downhill on the other side. In fact, everything in recent years has been fed out by the next productive period.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. If this bill becomes a law no cold-storage food can be put on the market that has been kept in cold storage longer than one year?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes; one year.

Mr. KEARNS. What will become of the meats and all the other food products that are now in cold storage and that will be in cold storage when this law passes, if it does pass, and that have been in cold storage, say, for two or three years?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The 90-day period operates in here before these people will actually pass on this law. I take it they will feed out that stuff during the 90-day period.

Mr. KEARNS. They will be able to feed out in 90 days after the passage of this law all the food that has been in cold storage for a year or more?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Probably they would.

Mr. KEARNS. It is shown in the press reports that there are meats in cold storage that have been there for many years, sufficient to supply the country for two or three years to come. That would be put out in various avenues so that it could reach the people? Is that true?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not know that that is true. The packers deny that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will hand the gentleman the statement of the Department of Agriculture on that subject.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. The point I have in mind is to suggest to the gentleman that there is probably enough meat in cold storage, according to the testimony, of all kinds and descriptions, to last the United States for four and a half or five days. There is more newspaper talk than real meat.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. So much, then, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, for the 12 months' period.

Now, another proposition. You will have to have some kind of system under which this law can be operated, and by which you can determine when an article enters storage. We do that by means of a stamping process, to the effect that when a man puts into storage an article or articles he must stamp the date at which they enter storage, and if those articles be transferred from one State to another, or from one storage house to another, they must carry their stamp of each storage house, so that when it is finally sent out there will be found every date on those packages, so that the public can not be imposed upon.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How will that help the consumer if there is a case of eggs with the dates stamped on it? The retailer gets the case of eggs and sells half a dozen to this fellow and half a dozen to another fellow.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That does not help the consumer who buys from the retailer after it goes into the retail trade. When they get into the retail trade Congress has no longer jurisdiction to take charge of this matter and follow it down to the individual consumer. We have gone as far as we could go under the jurisdiction, as we understand it. This body has to enact a law. So much, then, for the stamping proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It has been rumored and possibly stated in the press at different times that great quantities of fruit and vegetables have been destroyed or dumped into the river with a view of avoiding glutting the market and resultant reduction in prices. In the course of your investigation did you ascertain whether these statements are true or not?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That was denied by everybody who appeared before the committee. I have heard that lots of peaches and articles of that sort have been dumped in the river.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is nothing in this bill that will make it a penal offense to willfully destroy food products?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Not in this bill. You have the 12 months; you have the stamping proposition by which we can keep track of the articles as they enter cold storage.

Then another thing in which the public is vitally interested is the food that we use day by day, and you and I have a right to know whether it is cold-storage stuff or not. We can go to the jobbers and to the wholesale trade, and these packages, which are unbroken, must be marked as cold-storage stuff. We have a right to know that, and to know further that these articles of food, whether cheese or eggs or meat or fish or poultry, have been stored in a healthful place, a place that has been kept clean and which has not added filth to that which the people must consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. So we have put a provision in this bill to give the Secretary the power to inspect these rooms and to see that they are kept in such order that the food products that enter into them shall be clean, healthful food products when they come out.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In that connection, I notice that in section 10 the power is given to the Secretary of Agriculture to inspect any books, papers, letters, or other documents. Is not that a rather unusual power?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. It is a right far-reaching power.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course this is prior to any conviction or any charge against the person and entirely without any process of court. It merely delegates to an officer, and it may be a deputy, the power, and a rather strong power, of search and seizure.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. It does.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would it not be preferable to leave the question as to examining letters, papers, books, and documents, and so forth, to a court order or some process by which that can be done legally?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not think there will ever be an abuse of that power. It is a power given so that you can keep a trace of these institutions. We want to know how the stuff is handled. We want to know through how many hands it passes. We do not want it to pass from one State to another and cover up an effort to keep it off the market, when the people need it for consumption, until it has been destroyed, and you have got to have power somewhere so that you can get the facts if there is a crooked dealer who is trying to keep these facts from the public.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am in thorough sympathy with the bill, and I agree with what the gentleman says. The thing that occurred to me was that ordinarily we are careful to preserve the right of a person who is not charged with any crime to be free from any search or seizure. Would it not be better to confine this to cases where a charge is made against somebody?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not agree with the gentleman. I do not think there is anything in the section whereby that power will be abused or can be abused. It is simply to enable them to get the information immediately.

Mr. PURNELL. The real purpose of that section is to provide for the inspection of the warehouses?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. For some reason or other the section provides that the papers, letters, and other documents relating thereto may be inspected. I think myself that portion of the section might very well be stricken out, because it does not relate to the sanitary or insanitary condition of the plant.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Well, I think we might need that power frequently to trace the shipment of food, as to the time.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. VOIGT. In that connection I want to say that the books, papers, and so forth, referred to in line 23 on page 6 refer only to contents and operations of the warehouse; that is, it is guarded in this way: An inspection of the papers does not mean an inspection of all private papers of the operator. It refers only to the contents and physical operation of that warehouse.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is right. Another proposition: We have provided here for a report to be made each 30 days as to the articles and quantities of food supplies on hand. That is a very important piece of information that we ought to have, and by calling for these reports the public can be kept informed at all times, and it will be official information when the law is passed. We shall not be misled by newspaper reports. The public at this very instant has the idea that all the warehouses in this country are absolutely crammed to overflowing with all kinds of food supplies while the people are unable to buy them because they are held at such prohibitive prices. These sensational journals that make these statements without facts backing them up will be cut out from that field of misrepresentation. With this power given here the Secretary can call for the inventory of the food products that are on hand, and then the public will know just what to expect, and will know what we have and what our consumptive capacity is, and will not longer be misled by sensational journalism. [Applause.]

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. I notice that one section provides that the subdivisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 shall not apply to any article of food delivered to any foreign country. Will not that section permit the cold-storage people to violate the law on the theory that the food which is stored there is intended for foreign consumption?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Well, we had to take care of the foreign situation in some way and we guarded it as best we could.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I will call the gentleman's attention to the following section, which provides that the exemption shall not apply unless the goods are actually shipped to foreign countries.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I think, gentlemen, those are the high points in the bill. The public will understand by the enactment of this cold-storage law that they will be given uniformity of cold storage. The cold-storage industry is a very important industry in this country. I want to see it built up. It means that the farmer will have a better price for his product which he could not sell at all in the overproduction of one season, as in the case of eggs and other articles of food. We must be careful not to destroy the institution of cold storage. It is one of those intervening agencies that both the producer and consumer must have in order that our people shall not suffer want for these great products of the country. The cold-storage people are not opposed to the enactment of this law. When it is enacted it will become a uniform law. It guards against hoarding, because you have a 12-month or seasonable period. You have your regulations to preserve the health of the people, and in the long run it will result in great benefit; not that it is going to cause a drop of these prices now, but it will stabilize the prices, because the cold-storage man, when he keeps in that cold-storage warehouse against the coming day of production a great supply of stuff in order to boost the market, will know that he is going to run against a stone wall after the new production comes, and he is going to deal according to proper rules and feed out these products on the market as the market demands at more uniform and reasonable prices.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman stated at the outset that the cost of living would not be materially reduced by the enactment of this bill. In view of the expense that would be imposed upon the warehousemen and the transportation companies in making these reports I am curious to know who will be benefited by the enactment of this legislation?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I have stated the facts as well as I could. I am going to be benefited, and you are going to be benefited, and every citizen of the Nation is going to be benefited. In the first place, you are going to stop this howl that dissatisfies people, to the effect that cold-storage folks have got warehouses piled to the ceiling with stuff, holding it off the market in order to boost prices. This law provides that cold-storage men can not do it. You have got to pass it out in 12 months. The law forces them to put it out, and it will make a general average of prices.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that there was no such a custom as this involved; that the warehousemen had not been keeping food in cold storage.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I said there were charges of that kind, some of which were probably true, but not to the extent that the public generally believed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. KEARNS. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that there was not in cold storage and had not been at any time foodstuffs sufficient to meet the need of the country for more than 30 or 40 days.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The testimony shows that on the general average that is true.

Mr. KEARNS. The evidence shows that the 30 days' supply applied to beef and pork.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That does not change the fact that here and there over the Nation there are men who hoard this stuff, and some of them let it go to destruction, expecting to profit by so doing. This will stop all that. The country will know that we have a law here that provides that everything produced in a year will have to be sold in a year, and the prices will assume a general average, and the health regulations will be enforced in keeping these warehouses in a proper condition. That will justify the law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the gentleman to say that many things that are not true are published in the newspapers. But if they are, they give employment to the people who send the dispatches or write the articles. [Laughter.] He says that those statements are overdrawn and in many instances absolutely untrue.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. CANNON. Has the committee inquired how much that is going to damage the newspapers in their circulation? [Laughter.]

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I hope it will damage them enough, so as to stop that kind of yellow journalism.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much expense will this bill entail upon the Government to perform these additional duties in the making of these inspections, obtaining these reports, and so forth?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. We put in an appropriation of $50,000. That is very largely a guess. It is a simple piece of machinery, and I think the Agricultural Department can handle nearly everything that is called for in this bill by the force now on hand.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman does not think it will require much more money?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not see how it could.

Mr. WOOD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Virginia. What provision does the bill make against a man putting his eggs in cold storage and withdrawing them at the end of 11 months, putting them in new packages, and sending them back to the warehouse as fresh eggs?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Those eggs must be stamped when they go in.

Mr. WOOD of Virginia. Each egg?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. No; each container.

Mr. WOOD of Virginia. Suppose a packer puts in meat and then takes it out and takes the stamp off and puts it back again.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. There is a penalty provided for that.

Mr. WOOD of Virginia. That is about all you can do.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is about all we can do.

Mr. CONNALLY. Section 11 provides that every warehouseman or person transporting these articles in interstate commerce shall keep an account and make such reports as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe. Would that require a farmer who ships stuff in a refrigerator car to an interstate market to keep books and accounts?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Oh, no. He is not in the cold-storage business.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know, but he is transporting in interstate commerce in a refrigerator car. I am just asking what he would have to do.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. In the first place, I do not think any of that is done. It is the people who are engaged in the cold-storage business who are affected by this bill. That is the idea. I do not think it would cover a case like the gentleman states, and I do not think farmers engage in such transactions.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. When this bill goes into operation of course the warehouses will not have been employing these bookkeeping methods, and eggs may have been in storage some of them for nine months. Will this attempt to make them account for the time which they have already been in?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I think so.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. So as to show 12 months from the time they were first put in?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. But they may not have kept a record.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. We allow 90 days to cover such cases as that. Of course there will be a rough place when they start to carry out the provisions of the bill, but I think the Secretary of Agriculture will be liberal and use good judgment in placing the law in operation.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, on the 25th of August I made certain remarks about the packing interests, to which Swift & Co. take exceptions.

A very pleasant young gentleman, whose name I do not recall, called at my office and presented a statement denying my statements, and asking that I secure the printing of the same in the RECORD. I told him of course that I should regret having done any injustice to Swift & Co., and I should seek to have their statement put in the RECORD, provided I should be permitted to make such other remarks as the facts seemed to warrant.

The Swift & Co. statement is as follows:

The statement regarding the packers by Representative WILLIS J. HULINGS, of Pennsylvania, as quoted on page 4308 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Monday, August 25, is unwarranted. The packers do not enjoy any special privileges or discriminations in freight rates through the use of their privately owned refrigerator cars. All services and rates are open to any shipper who will meet the requirements and guarantee the required minimum weight or charge, or both, as the case may be. Considered as a financial investment, these refrigerator cars have represented a loss to the packers, but the latter wish to retain their ownership of them because they can keep them in a more sanitary condition than is possible under railroad ownership and can secure more dependable service through their very efficient transportation departments.

Representative HULINGS also mentions the large number of products apparently unrelated to the meat-packing industry which are now handled by the packers. The Federal Trade Commission has made much of this point in its report and listed some 630 items which it claims were sold by the five large packers. Analysis showed this list to be unfairly padded in order to make the list appear as long as possible. For example, "dry sausage" and "dried sausage" were listed as separate products as well as all the different kinds of dried sausage; similarly, "canned fruit" appears as one article, in addition to each variety of canned fruit. Altogether, some 62 classified terms of this kind were included as separate articles.

Outside of meats and their natural by-products, Swift & Co. handles only poultry, eggs, butter, cheese, canned goods, and a little smoked fish. Each one of these products has been added only because we felt that we could handle it at a saving to the consumer because of our unusual equipment or organization. Most of these products require refrigeration in transit and storage, which equipment has already been provided to take care of our meats. In the case of canned goods, we handle these because they have been demanded by our retail customers, who do not see why our salesmen can not supply them with their canned goods as well as meats, thus saving double ordering.

The packers do not monopolize the trade in these lines as the commission attempts to prove. The commission bases its statement that the five large packers control over 65 per cent of the dressed poultry and eggs in the United States upon an estimate by trade competitors, who naturally would be interested in having our percentage appear to be as large as possible. Swift & Co. handles less than 6½ per cent of the poultry, eggs, and butter entering trade channels, and we estimate that the five large packers together handle only 15 or 20 per cent. It is unfortunate that misstatements of this kind are permitted to enter the official records of Congress.

I can not resist the conclusion that "misstatements of this kind" are found in Swift & Co.'s letter above quoted rather than in anything I said.

Why quibble about "dry sausage" and "dried sausage"? Everybody knows that the big packers are handling pretty much every kind of groceries.

I spoke only of "the packers," but Swift & Co. take up cudgels in behalf of the whole blooming bunch and deny my statements, and I therefore assume that Swift & Co. speaks for "the packers."

Its denials carry the half truths which characterize the special pleader. Swift & Co. claims that it enjoys no special privileges through the use of its privately owned refrigerator cars, and seeks to convey the impression that outside of meats and its by-products the company handles only a few products, such as poultry, eggs, butter, cheese, canned goods, and smoked fish. Swift & Co. denies that it monopolizes trade in these lines, which is doubtless true, since it is only one of the Big Five.

Swift & Co. has recently been divided into four parts: Swift & Co. proper; Libby, McNeil & Libby; the Swift Internationale; and the National Leather Co., a newly organized $30,000,000 corporation, which has taken over all the hide, tanning, and leather business formerly done by Swift & Co. These new companies are controlled by the Swift interests, but are separate from Swift & Co., the corporation. It is, therefore, now technically correct for Swift & Co. to deny any responsibility for the present high price of shoes, because it is not interested in the hide, tanning, or leather business, but the value of a denial of Swift & Co. as to any commodity depends upon how completely the transfer of business in that commodity has been delivered to the three newly created companies. These companies, in effect, are still Swift & Co., but legally, technically, and for propaganda purposes, and as a means of covering up the enormous total of business in which the Swifts are interested, they are separate and unconnected concerns.

That the packers do enjoy discriminations in freight rates through their refrigerator cars was admitted recently before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by an expert on this subject, who, however, claimed that those who are big enough to do a peddler-car business could get the same advantages. The witness was C. B. Heinemann, secretary of the National Live Stock Exchange, Union Stock Yards, Chicago. The committee permitted Dr. Virtue, of the Federal Trade Commission's staff, to ask Heinemann a few questions. The testimony—part 1, Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry hearings, on S. 2199 and S. 2202, page 487—was as follows:

Dr. VIRTUE. But as the matter actually works out in practice to-day, I understand then, and you say, when a grocer, for example, ships one of these commodities that come under a rule of a packing-house product he does, as a rule, pay a higher rate under the class that he ships under than the packer does in his shipment under the flat packing-house rate?

Mr. HEINEMANN. Yes; and why does he? Because he has too many economists and not enough traffic experts to show him the way out of the difficulty.

Dr. VIRTUE. Then there is a way out?

Mr. HEINEMANN. Yes, sir; there is.

Dr. VIRTUE. Is that rate open to him?

Mr. HEINEMANN. Yes, sir; certainly; it would not be on file with the commission if it were not.

Dr. VIRTUE. Will you point out to the committee how he can secure that rate, unless he operates the peddler car?

Mr. HEINEMANN. That is the question: Why doesn't he operate it?

Dr. VIRTUE. Because it is not a peddler-car business.

Of course, the average shipper can not ship in carload lots, and the packer thus has an advantage.

There is an obvious advantage or discrimination in favor of the big packers under the so-called "mixing" freight rules.

These rules were devised either to permit the combination of various and different articles to make up and reduce the carload minimum, or to permit mixed shipment of various and unrelated articles manufactured by a particular industry or group of shippers. In either case the rules benefit the particular industry that has all the articles to ship, and works adversely to the shipper of the separate individual articles permitted by the mixing rules and their exceptions.

The rules vary considerably in different sections of the country. A plainly stated rule is sometimes so modified by exceptions as to be interpreted only by its framers.

For instance, in official classification territory, the general mixing rule is known as rule 10. This is modified by three separate exceptions, applicable solely to articles shipped by the packer. (See Morris, I. C. C., 736.) Under these exceptions various combinations of fresh meats and packing-house products may be made, so that different rates per article or per car are possible. These exceptions permit the mixing not only of meats, but also many by-products as well as unrelated articles, such as poultry, cheese, groceries, and even stationery, advertising matter, butchers' coats and aprons. These articles may be mixed with the packing products and receive the benefit of expedited movement in less than carload quantities, which of itself is a great advantage.

Not only are these rules so devised as to favor the particular industry which is sufficiently integrated to take full advantage of their many provisions, but they are also so arranged that they countenance "place discrimination." Competitive business is materially restricted to this extent.

The mixing rules are, of course, a part of the railroad tariffs, and as such are open to all shippers on the same basis, but they are clearly discriminatory in favor of the big packers, in that they are the only shippers who have the variety of products to ship. They can take advantage of the provisions. The small shippers who do not have the variety can not do so.

This point was aptly brought out by George Merki, chief inspector, General Freight Association Inspection and Weighing, in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission at Chicago in February, 1918. In answer to a question as to whether there was discrimination between the packers Mr. Merki said:

None that I can see, unless there is a little fellow on the fringe of the yard who may not have something he can put in there; he may not have any soap he can put in his car; his car may not have anything but cured meats. (I. C. C. Docket 4906, vol. 63, p. 4405.)

The little fellow gets it in the neck, as usual.

The mixing rules operate in favor of the large shipper in the various articles permitted to be mixed under the rules in that he is able to ship small quantities of a great variety of products in mixed carload lots, whereas the small shipper who desires to ship the same amount of any given product, but has not the various articles to make up a mixed carload must make his shipment at the established class rates.

At the Chicago rate hearing above referred to Mr. Merki introduced several tables in detail, showing the difference in rates in favor of the packers under the latitude of the mixing rule, and the exceptions to rule 10.

Exhibit 1 showed that the packers saved $8.25 per car. The difference was because under rule 10 the fourth-class rate would apply to the entire shipment, whereas under the exception the fifth-class rate applied to about one-third the shipment. In other words, the mixing permitted a lower rate to be made. This shipment was made up of smoked and pickled pork—fifth-class rate—and fresh beef chuck meat—fourth class.

Exhibit 2, a shipment of Morris & Co. from Chicago to Washington, which contained no fresh meat, but a large variety of pickled and canned goods, soaps, and so forth, showed a saving to the packer of $15.51 per car.

Exhibit 3, a shipment of Morris & Co. from Chicago to Washington, containing fresh meats, pickled meats, and butterine, showed a saving of $29.50 per car.

Other discriminations resulting from mixing privileges against shippers of commodities similar to those of the packers are as follows:

They give expedited service to groceries, cheese, lard, glue, soap, soap powder, and other products, and in time of embargoes against such articles enable the packer to get his shipments through to market.

Beef refrigerator cars may be used for large quantities of fifth-class freight that can just as well be shipped in ordinary box cars or ventilator refrigerator cars. This practice amounts to a wasteful use of specialized equipment.

The exceptions to the rule itself permit combinations of goods to lower the minimum weight per car, a result which enables the packer to ship any quantity of articles and in exactly the amount required to any one place, which is often a branch house. This means that more cars will be required to ship the same tonnage; that the railroads receive correspondingly less revenue, and the packers receive a greater revenue from mileage.

Whatever the merits of the controversy concerning rates, the fact remains that the five big packers control and use 90 per cent of this class of car service; that it operates as a vast distributing vehicle over the whole of the United States with greater expedition and far more daily mileage than is gotten out of ordinary freight carriers; that more than 90 per cent of the goods in these cars is often made up of packer commodities other than fresh meats (testimony of packer witness in Interstate Commerce Commission case No. 3150. See vol. 1, p. 430 present Senate hearings); that these cars furnish a fast and direct service not only for the 1,120 packer branch houses in the large centers but cover 25,000 towns in 15 Middle West States alone; that the car route and branch-house sales of the five big packers amounted in 1916 to 58 per cent of their total sales, and that in this part of the packer system lies one of the most important factors in extending their monopolistic grip on production and control of distribution.

That it is not easy for new concerns to secure this class of service from railroads even for meats is aptly illustrated by the Intertate Commerce Commission case of B. Frankfield & Co. v. the New York Central Railroad, referred to by Mr. Heinemann in his testimony. (Vol. 1, Senate hearings, p. 405.)

In 1912, shortly after imported fresh meats were made duty free, the Frankfield Co. undertook to bring fresh frozen meats from Argentina to New York for general distribution in the United States.

At first, according to the record, the company was for a time supplied by the railroad with packer cars, but the supply unaccountably became insufficient and irregular. There strangely developed a change of policy on the part of the railroad companies, which began to supply packer cars less freely than in the beginning, several times packer cars were placed alongside vessels for loading with the Frankfield Co.'s meats, and then suddenly were withdrawn before loading.

The respondent railroads had some meat cars of their own, but not equipped with meat hooks. To some extent the Frankfield Co. furnished hooks, which cost about $20 a car, but as these were not returned they represented a loss.

In the beginning the Frankfield Co. was given free floatage of cars to and from ships, but in July, 1914, a charge was established of $9 a car for each car less than six on a float. The Frankfield Co. seldom had as many as six cars for shipment over any one railroad. Later this floatage charge was somewhat reduced by agreement. The record does not show whether this floatage charge applied to the Argentine beef imports of the Chicago packers, but presumably it did not, as they would undoubtedly have six or more cars to float.

Although they were receiving inquiries from all over the United States, inability to secure suitable cars and the six-car floatage rule compelled the Frankfield Co. to restrict their trade practically to local territory reached by trucking.

Unless Swift & Co. states what commodities and what proportion of their former business has been transferred to the newly formed Libby, McNeill & Libby, Swift Internationale, and National Leather corporations its allegations as to present volume of business in commodities other than meats and immediate by-products are of little value. It is reasonable to suppose that a large proportion of Swift & Co.'s former business in canned goods, eggs, poultry, and fish has been transferred to Libby, McNeill & Libby. It is also reasonable to suppose that the Swift Internationale handles these commodities abroad.

Suffice it to say that at the time of the Federal Trade Commission's investigation the Swift interests alone owned or controlled 52 poultry and egg-packing plants and 180 buying stations in a few States that seemed allotted to them by the other big packers, who devote most of their attention in this line to other territory. Of the 89 poultry and egg-packing plants and 222 buying stations owned or controlled by the "Big Five" at only 10 places do two or more of them have buying stations or poultry plants, which warrants the suspicion that there is a working arrangement wherein these big concerns that hold themselves out to the public as competitors.

The butter business of Swift & Co. alone had reached during the commission's investigation a total of 50,000,000 pounds a year. Swift & Co. is now the largest butter dealer in the world, rivaling in this respect Armour & Co., which became, according to the boast of one of its vice presidents, the "largest rice merchant in the world" at the end of its first year's dealing in this staple food.

In 1916 the poultry and dairy products sold through branch houses by all the packers engaged in interstate slaughtering totaled 98.5 per cent of the poultry, 95.9 per cent butter, 93.9 per cent cheese, and 97.9 per cent eggs for the "Big Five." Of poultry Swift & Co. sold 63.1 per cent; of butter, 41.1 per cent; of cheese, 34.2 per cent; and eggs, 46.6 per cent. This does not cover additional sales by the "Big Five" or independent slaughterers through consignments on commission, or direct sales to wholesalers, or through car routes, or through direct sales from the packing plants to retailers.

In view of the failure of Swift & Co. in its statement concerning my speech to disclose how much of its former business outside of meats and by-products remains in the company and how much has been transferred to the three new allied Swift corporations, it is impossible to discuss the correctness of the Swift statement in detail.

For instance, the statement does not mention cottonseed oil, which is not a meat by-product, but which was a considerable part of Swift & Co.'s business at the time of the Federal Trade Commission's investigation. It does not mention the lard and other vegetable compounds arising out of this business. It does not mention hotel and household food supplies, in many of which Swift & Co. are interested in addition to meats and by-products, and poultry, butter, cheese, eggs, and fish. For instance, salt, pepper, catsup and other spices, coffee, bath salts, apple butter, apple cider, buckwheat, cereals, coca cola, cocoa, coconuts, creme de menthe, dried vegetables, evaporated fruits, flour, fresh fruit and vegetables, ginger, grape juice, ginger ale, pineapple sirup, hominy, horse radish, imitation maraschino, jams, jellies, lemon extract, malt sprouts, milk, molasses, mustard and mustard seed, peanuts, powdered milk, pumpkins, rice, soda-fountain supplies, spaghetti, bran, and walnuts, and so on in the entire range of modern household supplies. None of these commodities are by-products of the meat business. It may be that Swift & Co. has transferred its interest in these commodities to one of the three new allied corporations, but it is hardly probable that the Metropolitan Hotel Supply Co., of New York; the Independent Salt Co., of West Virginia; the Bencini Cotton Oil Mills, of Texas; the Sturtevant & Haley Beef & Supply Co., of Boston; the Springfield Provision Co.; the Vermont Supply Co.; the Atlanta Hotel Supply Co., of Atlanta; the Omaha Hotel Supply Co.; and many other Swift & Co. subsidiaries do not still deal in all or most of the above-listed commodities not arising from the meat business.

Mr. Hoover said a year ago, in a letter to the President, concerning the packers:

> Here is a growing and a dangerous domination in the handling of the Nation's foodstuffs.
> They have a practical monopoly on meat products, and they are attempting to control all the Nation's food products. They claim that their profits are less than a cent a pound on the beef they sell, but in 1917 the Big Five made a profit of $95,639,000, and just how much Swift & Co. made I can not say, but it was an enormous sum after all the deduction for big salaries, "depreciation," and all that goes to side-step the collector of excess profits taxes, and it is very significant that Swift & Co. should divide into four corporations, because a concern making very great profits would have to pay the Government a large proportion as taxes, on excess profits, but four companies aggregating the same profits would not have to pay nearly as much tax.
> Somebody is paying these huge profits, and that somebody is the consuming public.
> The Government should break up the combination, or put the business under proper regulation. Which do the packers want?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to attempt to speak of the details of the provisions of the bill that is now before the committee. However, I want to make some observations on the general subject of the conditions prevailing in the country and what we commonly call the high cost of living. There has been a great deal published in the papers and magazines on this subject, and I think a great many nostrums have been proposed in the way of suggestions. But the other day I received a personal letter from a farmer in my district, a man who has been a success in farming, who started at the bottom, who has a large farming interest. He wrote me a personal letter that I thought contained so much of good, common horse sense and outlined such a sensible way of remedying this situation that I am going to ask that this letter may be read in my time. I believe it will commend itself to the judgment and good sense of the people as one way of solving this high cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JAS. T. ANDERSON & SONS,
Hurricane Mills, Tenn., September 24, 1919.

Hon. L. P. PADGETT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PADGETT: I want to tell you just a little about the real condition in the country. I am 60 years old; have been closely associated with the laboring people all my life, as I was raised at hard labor, plowing blind horses on steep hillsides and working small, poor steers plowing in new land, hauling crossties with a pair of old blind horses, digging ore with the darkies at Warner Furnace, in Hickman County; then we got $1 per day to work at public works. I remember well in 1882 working at the furnace at $1 per day, paid 25 cents per pound for bacon, $1.25 per sack for flour, $1.60 per bushel for meal, and at that time we worked long hours under a boss man. I never heard of a labor union then, never heard of a strike; in fact, for many years after that date we never heard of a strike; but in these later days we can't pick up a paper but what we see something about strikes, increased wages, shorter hours, and high cost of living.

I can truthfully say to you that I never saw so much indifference on the part of people to work in my life; it is next to impossible to get people to work, and especially so on the farm. I am certain everything the farmer raises is high enough if he could just get labor to produce and take care of his products. I honestly believe if the Government discourages the production of the essentials of life any further that many people will suffer for something to eat. This may sound foolish to you, but you just watch what I have said and see if it don't come true. There is just too much loafing and not enough producing.

I do not oppose high wages, and there is nothing too good for the laboring people, but they have got to the point where nothing satisfies them, and I honestly believe the sooner they realize where they stand the better it will be for everybody. I am sure you know more about these things from a statistical standpoint than I do, but I am sure I have stated things just as I have seen and known them to be. I have tried hard to be fair with the people who have worked for me. I have raised their wages from time to time without them asking me to, until I have gone my limit, and there is no use thinking about me paying what they now want, for I can not, and therefore my land must lay out, and there are many acres laying out to-day.

I am sure in my mind that it is not at all necessary for the United States of America to encourage the reduction of acreage in wheat sowing, for there is no wheat being sown to amount to anything. If wages go to $10 per day, with a six-hour day, and bread is $1 per loaf, what is gained to the laborer by high prices for his labor. In my honest opinion the shortening of the days and increasing of wages is causing less production every day of the essentials of life, for the more they get the more extravagant they are with the nonessentials. I am creditably informed that all the girls to-day who work in our southern hosiery mills are not satisfied to wear their own products, but must have $1.50 silk hose, the office boys are wearing $12.50 to $15 silk shirts. The country people are crazy for all such things, and, in addition, automobiles are much commoner than I ever saw buggies; the people go from all over the country to the shows of every kind; the average farmer to-day does not manifest as much interest in producing farm products as he did 20 years ago. Now, Mr. PADGETT, I have not intended to knock anyone or anything; I have tried to just simply outline facts as I have seen and know them, and to save my life I can't see how there can ever be any real cheap living until people change their course. I have honestly known people to sell their war savings stamps to go to the shows; they just won't keep a bond at all. I only have this hope, that you and other good sober thinking Members of Congress can work out some plan to get the people to thinking seriously and soberly about the seriousness of the situation, and get everybody willing to go to work doing honest work and quit talking politics and high cost of living until they had time to produce a surplus of the essentials of life.

I honestly believe that every man that has a sound body should be forced to work 12 hours per day, not less than 10 under no circumstances. If they had to work more, they would produce more and have less time to loaf and spend.

Your friend,

JAS. T. ANDERSON.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, it occurred to me there was so much real common sense in that letter that I thought it deserved to go into the RECORD. The things that are emphasized in this letter—more work, better work, more production and better production, and less extravagance and less idleness—should commend themselves to our good judgment. We are having a great many suggestions, but it seems to me that the keynote of the situation is to relieve the high cost of living by putting forth greater effort, greater energy, more labor, better labor, and better production. I believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire. I think I have shown in my service in the Congress and have had an opportunity to show that I am a good friend of labor, and I speak as the friend of labor. I believe at the same time, as a corollary to the proposition that the laborer is worthy of his hire, that the employer is deserving of a product commensurate with the wages which he pays.

And these two must go together. Labor should realize that when it is receiving $10 a day, as many are for labor, they should produce products of $10 to justify that wage.

We have just come out of a war with Germany. I do not wish to set Germany up as an example, but I have been informed that in Germany, in order to rehabilitate that country, the labor elements have of their own volition adopted a 10-hour day in order to increase production and to relieve the situation and to rehabilitate their country. If that be so, we might take a hint from our former enemy in the war.

We hear in this country that a great organization, the mining association, is demanding a six-hour day, a five-day week, and at the same time they are coupling it with a demand for a 60 per cent increase in pay. In other words, increase pay to the maximum and reduce production to the minimum. It is contrary to every sound, fundamental principle of economics. The country must realize it, and upon no body of men is it more incumbent than the Congress of the United States that the time has come when we must realize that in this country we must place ourselves on a sound fundamental foundation, on principles of true economics, if we are to bring the country to a state of production and destroy the high cost of living. [Applause.]

One other thing, the founders of this Government had a theory and policy that the individual would support the Government. There seems to be now a new doctrine supplanting it and reversing it, that the Government must support the people and support the individual.

That is false. It will not work, and until we get back to the sound principle and the sound doctrine that the people must support the Government and maintain the Government by industry, by honesty, by perseverance, by economy, and by saving, we will never bring down the high cost of living. We will never do that until we get on a sound basis, sound doctrine, sound principle, and genuine work of production. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If the organization the gentleman speaks of should succeed in getting the day reduced to six hours and the pay increased, does he think that his friend who wrote the letter that has been read, the farmer, or any other farmer could get any labor on his farm? Will it not take them all into the cities?

Mr. PADGETT. The farmer could get no laborers. Here is a country threatened with a shortage of the supply of fuel, with winter coming on, with everybody asking that the high cost of living may be reduced, and here comes this demand that production shall be reduced to the minimum, that wages shall be increased to the maximum.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. There will be nobody left on the farms to produce anything.

Mr. PADGETT. They want the wages put to the maximum and the production to the minimum, and the country is to suffer.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I want to call attention to the fact that the demand on the part of the organization the gentleman speaks of—for 60 per cent increase in wages and a six-hour day and a five-day week—is based upon or follows another demand, which is that the coal mines of the country be nationalized. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think that the demand for this increase in wages and the five-day work week and the six-hour day is perfectly consistent and logical, in view of the other demand for the nationalization of the mines?

Mr. PADGETT. I think the demand for the nationalization of the mines is a camouflage for confiscation.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LUCE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LUCE. To address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman on the committee?

Mr. LUCE. I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. LUCE. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LUCE. Last month, while you gentlemen were joining with the President in lowering the cost of living, I stole a few days at my Sabine farm, and one morning—this I say in order to get the good will of the Committee on Agriculture—I was engaged in swinging a stub scythe, perhaps the most laborious form of exercise I could enjoy, cutting down weeds alongside a stone wall. I stuck the end of the scythe into a hornet's nest. Had the gentleman from Texas been on hand he would have had no occasion to doubt the presence of a quorum. [Laughter.] Forthwith I moved to adjourn. [Laughter.] I left the stub scythe right there in possession of the hornets.

In taking the position I take to-day on this bill I know that I am inviting a swarm of hornets from my district and from the whole country, if my words attract attention beyond these walls, for the people have been imbued with misinformation by the money-making propaganda of the yellow press until they have reached such a stage of anger that they are ready to crucify anybody who questions their beliefs.

You have read of the bull fight, where the matador holds up his red cloak before the bull, and when the bull rushes madly toward him, throws the cloak to one side, deftly springs to the other, and so escapes as the bull lunges toward the cloak. I have in my hands, sir, an address of the President of the United States delivered in this Chamber. If any gentleman desires, through the propinquity of these remarks, to draw any inference he is welcome so to do. I make none myself, but I desire to refresh your memory as to what the President said of our duty in this emergency:

> To the same end I earnestly recommend, in the second place, that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage, as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in cold storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt.

I do not suggest that this resembles in any way the red cloak of the matador.

The President went on to say:

> It would materially add to the serviceability of the law, for the purpose we now have in view, if it were also prescribed that all goods released from storage for interstate shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. By this means the purchaser would always be able to learn what profits stood between him and the producer or the wholesale dealer.

I observe that the Committee on Agriculture, while responding partly to the appeal of the President, has failed to throw another sop to Cerberus by adding some proviso to meet this further suggestion of our leading preceptor of economics. But without discussing the refusal of the Committee on Agriculture to go the whole distance, let us examine what it has done. It has presented to us in the guise and under the pretext of lowering the cost of living what is essentially a health measure, and as such it might well be passed. Viewing it as a health measure, I have no word to say against it. Such a measure was passed in my State; it has been passed, I think, in 13 States, primarily for the purpose of protecting the health of the people. But it is absurd to represent it as a wise and prudent economic measure. More than that, sir; it seems to me utterly unjustifiable in an emergency like this to deceive the people by giving them to understand that this is any remedy for the ills of which they are complaining. If we are to imagine the people an angry bull, enraged by their misconception of what is going on, furious in the attempt to destroy somebody, perhaps it is prudent by such measures as this to save ourselves from being gored. Perhaps it is justifiable to deceive the people in the hope that thereby we may escape their insane wrath. Perhaps by a temporizing policy when they ask for bread it is wise by giving them a stone to try to stave off their indignation.

But, sir, even though mine should be the only voice in this House to be raised against the betrayal of truth, it shall be raised in the hope that there may go in the RECORD at least the protest of one man against the deception of the people.

Now, sir, what is my warrant for addressing you upon this subject? Once before I gave it to the House; but let me go a little more into detail with explanation. Motley, in his introduction to the Rise of the Dutch Republic, says that when an unknown writer asks the attention of the public upon an important theme he is not only authorized, but required, to show that by industry and earnestness he has entitled himself to a hearing. So when I venture to take the time of the House on this matter, responding to the principle of Motley's wise statement, I feel justified in saying that nine years ago I was asked by the governor of my State to serve as the chairman of a commission on the cost of living, and six years afterwards was asked by another governor to serve as chairman of another commission on that subject. I hold in my hand the product of the first of these Massachusetts commissions on that subject, a book of about 750 pages. If I had been wholly responsible for it, modesty would, of course, preclude my saying anything with regard to its worth, but, since I was only in part responsible for it, perhaps I shall be pardoned for saying that this book has been placed on the shelves of the universities of the land as reading matter for the students in their economic classes, and some have been even good enough to affix to it the epithet of authoritative. This, in so far as it applies to my part of the work, I wholly disclaim, lest I may be charged with presumption. At any rate, however, I may say this, that I shared in the study, and if I am not qualified to give you some little information on the subject it is because I did not make use of my opportunity.

In the course of our investigations we, of course, handled the matter of cold storage. Let me read you two or three of our conclusions.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. With great pleasure.

Mr. WELTY. What date was that book published?

Mr. LUCE. In 1910.

Mr. WELTY. And what is the name?

Mr. LUCE. The Cost of Living, the report of the Massachusetts commission on that subject, of which, as I said, I had the honor to be the chairman. By the way, I may say that this commission was made up of five men having quite different points of view—a high-tariff man, a low-tariff man, a plain business man, the secretary of the Central Labor Union, and a free-trade Democrat. It was predicted that we never could come to a unanimous agreement. We did, and this report is unanimous, although the work of five men approaching the subject from such diverse angles.

Here are fragments of what we said upon this subject:

> Much of the popular clamor about cold storage must be set down to ignorance and hysteria. * * *
> The effect of cold storage on prices is, in general, to make them steadier, preventing extreme fluctuations, either upward or downward. The supply is reduced by the storing of products in time of plenty, and the price consequently does not fall so low. The supply is increased by the marketing of storage products in time of scarcity, and the price consequently does not rise so high. * * *
> Another beneficial effect of cold storage is to increase the production, and thus, of course, to lower the price of certain commodities. It does this by extending the period over which perishable products can be marketed, and thus stimulating a larger volume of production.

And I beg of you to notice this deliberate conclusion:

> In general, the business interest of dealers who place goods in cold storage may be depended upon to adjust the period of storage to the requirements of the consuming public. Nothing whatever is to be gained by holding goods in storage for an undue period until the goods become spoiled. So far as the price of cold-storage products is concerned, it would seem that the individuals engaged in the business of food distribution could be trusted to take goods out of storage at the time best suited to the needs of the consuming public.

Mr. Chairman, in every trade there are two parties—the seller and the buyer. Attention to-day is riveted on the seller. The buyer is ignored. But our common experience in life is that every transaction where there is involved a buyer and a seller accrues to the benefit of the buyer just as it accrues to the benefit of the seller. The trade would not go through if both parties were not advantaged; and that is the very basis of our economic system, the very basis of our social life, so far as commerce and industry are concerned, namely, that both parties are advantaged.

Here you have a bill of the type that is being pushed to-day, not only in this body but wherever the agitator can push it, a bill paying attention only to the views of the buyer in regard to what he thinks are the impositions of the seller. I ask you to come back to common sense and to remember that both persons are advantaged.

The price at which the consumer will buy measures his need for the article. The price at which the dealer will sell measures his need for money. The law of demand and supply brings these needs together and makes commerce possible.

Apply this to any form of storage and you will find that the greatest possible gain comes to the merchant if he takes his goods out of the warehouse at just the moment when, under the conditions of demand and supply, they will be of the greatest possible benefit to the consuming public. The most successful merchant is the man whose judgment is best in this particular. He benefits himself most because he benefits the public most. He gets the largest reward from society because he has performed for it the largest service.

This bill is part and parcel of no new agitation. If you take down your dusty law books of previous centuries, you may learn of three crimes that through many, many years the people of England, and afterwards the people of the Colonies, tried to suppress. They were known as regrating, forestalling, and engrossing. Through at least 500 years you may find the frequent record of attempts by these laws to suppress the man who had foresight enough to try to anticipate the future.

Some of you—possibly many of you—who have visited my own city of Boston have with great interest gone to see Faneuil Hall—the cradle of liberty. I want to recall to you its history. The money for Faneuil Hall was offered to the people of Boston by Peter Faneuil for the purpose of a market house. By the narrowest of margins—only seven votes—the people accepted the gift, and that was accomplished only by a subterfuge, of which our ancestors, perhaps, were no more proud than we would be had we been in their places.

On the spot they created a property qualification so as to shut out a large number of the voters, and thus they jammed through the acceptance of the money to build the market house. Destroyed by fire a few years later, it was replaced by the present edifice, with the market below and the famous hall above.

What was the contest about? Why, for more than a hundred years the people of Boston had been wrangling over this very question of profiteering. They thought that in a market there was an opportunity for the middleman to profiteer. You may find very curious descriptions of Boston at that time, when they tried to prevent men from buying food for the purpose of selling it again. I must not take the time to go into detail, but I could show you by countless excerpts from history how this aspect of the problem perplexed your fathers for generations back, and how, as civilization advanced, they finally came to discard the laws against regrating, forestalling, and engrossing. Since then for something more than a century we have been free from those shackles on commerce, and our country has thereby prospered greatly.

Now we are asked to return to the Middle Ages and enact once more provisions to prevent forestalling, engrossing, and regrating.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LUCE. I will.

Mr. VOIGT. Does the gentleman mean that there is anything in this bill that will prevent forestalling, engrossing, or regrating, as you call it?

Mr. LUCE. I was about to point out how this, like every other measure of its sort, is meant to hamper the middleman. That is nominally its purpose. The committee's report accompanying the bill and supposed to give the reason for it says:

> Those in control of the food supply of the country have been inclined to maintain and even advance prices beyond the point of reason. * * * It is the general opinion * * * that present high-price levels are unwarranted and unnecessary.

Whether or not this be true, take notice that the middleman is the one man to-day who is putting the brakes on the extravagance, the speculation, and the mad rush for wealth that are bringing us to the edge of the financial precipice. Take down your history of the United States in the period after the War of 1812 and read of what was going on in this country in 1816 and 1817. Recently we have each received a report from the Comptroller of the Currency telling of the large number of national banks being organized and the increases of capital by many others. Of this he is boasting, as if it were matter of congratulation. Such a report ought to be framed in a mourning border. It ought to have a danger signal printed upon it in red ink, for there is no more certain evidence of the catastrophe at hand. It was almost exactly a hundred years ago that Gov. Clinton was begging the legislature of the State of New York to stop the increase of the State banks and pointing out its inevitable effect. Then inflation led to the crisis of 1818, precisely such a crisis as to-day, a hundred years later, we are approaching.

Pass on to the period from 1834 to 1837 and you will find that during those years there was precisely the same unrest, precisely the same jealousy of wealth, precisely the same symptoms of all kinds that you now witness. The conditions that preceded the awful crash of 1837 are all about us to-day. Turn over the pages of history to the year 1856 and find again the same conditions as now. So in 1872 and 1893. In all those periods just before great panics the same phenomena appeared as appear to-day, and in all those periods there was the same need for precaution that we have now.

If I may digress for a yard out of my intended path, I want to express my belief that it would have been vastly better for the United States if the President, instead of journeying away from the Capital in this time of crisis, had stayed here to help us to take some precaution against the misery and suffering that we so rapidly approach. [Applause.] That is the need of the hour. It is not necessary to pass such insignificant and trifling bills as this, which are absolutely unimportant in comparison with the magnitude of the problem. What we ought to be considering is how somehow we can put the brakes on the inflation of the currency; I do not mean inflation in coin and bank notes, but our deposit currency, based on the enormous borrowings of the country. That is the need of the hour.

To get back to the subject of profiteering, in connection with the storing and hoarding of food, let me recall for a few minutes the great original profiteer and his history. And let me read a few extracts from a book that I trust is familiar to every man present. It is the story of a man after whom our respected ex-Speaker [Mr. CANNON] was named as well as half a dozen other Members of the House. The story of the original profiteer has peculiar application to this bill, because if a law such in spirit as is here purposed had prevailed in the time of the great original profiteer, no food could have been stored in Egypt for more than 12 months.

I want that to sink in. If a law such in spirit as this had been on the tablets in the time of which Genesis speaks, you never would have had the story of Joseph, and inasmuch as the story has been of instruction to many generations and to many millions of mankind, I for one am very glad that the bill recommended by the Committee on Agriculture was not passed by the congress of Pharoah. [Laughter.] Now, let us recall that—

It came to pass at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed: and, behold, he stood by the river.

And, behold, there came up out of the river seven well favored kine and fatfleshed; and they fed in a meadow.

And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill favored and leanfleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river.

And the ill favored and leanfleshed kine did eat up the seven well favored and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke.

Now, leaping the details of the dream, let me come down to the time when Pharaoh summoned his right-hand man, destined to go down to immortal—I must not say fame; that would not harmonize with the adjectives employed in the yellow press of to-day, to which we must give implicit faith and confidence—but let me say that this man went down to everlasting ignominy because he saw fit to tell Pharaoh what his dreams meant. And Joseph—that is the man's name—

Joseph said unto Pharaoh, the dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath shewed Pharaoh what He is about to do.

The seven good kine are seven years; and the seven good ears are seven years: the dream is one.

The seven lean and ill favored kine that came up after them are seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind shall be seven years of famine.

Hastening on—

And the seven years of plenteousness that was in the land of Egypt were ended.

And the seven years of dearth began to come, according as Joseph had said: And the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread.

And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: And Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do.

Imagine, if you will, to-day, proceeding on his triumphal tour through the West, the Chief Executive saying unto the people, "Go unto the storage men, who know something about this situation, and follow their advice." [Laughter.]

Now, what happened?

And the famine was over all the face of the earth: and Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt.

And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands.

This went along until the great original profiteer saw his chance to make a killing, and he said, "I have stored up all this corn and I will feed you," and he sold the corn. He said, "I will give you corn if you will give me land." And they traded all the land of Egypt until this man Joseph, the great original profiteer, had all the land in his possession, and he turned it over to Pharaoh; and then he made a trade with the people. "And it shall come to pass in the increase that ye shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh." That is, he demanded, as a return for his foresight, that a fifth part of the products of all the land of Egypt should belong to the King. What he said was:

Four parts shall be your own for seed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your households, and for food for your little ones.

Now, see how different the impressions of the people in those days from the attitude of the people of to-day toward the infamous men who follow in Joseph's footsteps, for the people of Egypt said, "Thou hast saved our lives. Let us find grace in the sight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's children."

"Thou hast saved our lives," for while they were grumbling at the profiteer, while they were complaining about the huge profits of the man of foresight, while they were denouncing his reward, yet the men of those times knew, "Thou hast saved our lives."

And while the profiteer was buying all the land and all the grain, and after he had put the grain in his storehouses, when famine was sore throughout the land, the children ate because of the profiteer; and when the famine waxed even more sore the women ate because of the profiteer; and then, at the end of those seven years, Egypt survived because of the profiteer; and ever since that time it has been always the man of foresight who has saved the peoples of the world from their own shiftlessness.

Mr. WELTY. Do I understand the gentleman to be in favor of amending this bill so as to provide for the storage of eggs for seven years? [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCE. I am not in favor of this bill at all.

Mr. WELTY. Would the gentleman be in favor of the bill if it were amended so as to provide for the seven-year storage of eggs?

Mr. LUCE. I would not be in favor of this bill under any circumstances, except in so far as it is a health measure. I think that one feature is valuable, to protect the people from insanitary food. For that purpose my own State has passed such a law, but my own State says that if at the end of 12 months the board of health sees no danger in continuing the storage, it may be permitted.

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman, of course, is not in favor of regulating Joseph, is he?

Mr. LUCE. I am not in favor of interference with the laws of trade economics beyond that point which is absolutely necessary.

Mr. WELTY. But was not Joseph responsible to Pharaoh, who was the government at that time?

Mr. LUCE. I do not understand the application of the question.

Mr. WELTY. I understood the gentleman was not in favor of regulating Joseph's conduct. I asked the gentleman whether Joseph was not responsible to Pharaoh, who was the government at that time?

Mr. LUCE. As I read the story, Pharaoh had become responsible to Joseph. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. With pleasure.

Mr. WELTY. Would the gentleman then advocate that the Government should be responsible to the profiteer?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I advocate that the Government shall at all times be responsible to the people who create it, and that the Government shall never attempt to deceive the people who created it. [Applause.] My protest against this bill is not against it as a health measure. Let me again and again reiterate that. My protest is against an interference with the laws of economics. I protest against this bill, as I hope to protest against every bill that tends to make the cost of living greater. From an economic point of view this law can have no effect at all, or else it will increase the burden of the people. It has been the history of all mankind that every governmental interference with the laws of economics has been futile, and for the most part it has been disastrous. There is something to be learned from that old story of King Canute.

You remember how he brought his throne down to the edge of the incoming tide, and he bade the waves to stop; but the waves kept coming on and coming on, and Canute said, "Stop," after the fashion of the gentleman who called us together and kept us from our vacation in order that the cost of living might be reduced. [Laughter.] He, too, said "Stop" to the great tides that are rising. He, too, put his throne at the edge of the waves, and when they began to lap his feet he not only had his throne moved back but he got out of it and ran away to the very farthest side of the continent. [Laughter.]

So, sir, I object to this bill and protest against it with all the feebleness of my utterance, and with profound regret that in this great emergency we might not have had at our command something more tangible and definite and useful. No committee of this House will report it. It was idle to keep us here in the hope—I dislike to use the slang of the streets, but I know of nothing more expressive than the phrase—of passing the buck to us. And now it may be that we are wise in accepting at its face value the false economics that were placed before us. It is not for me to speak as a party leader, for I am not such. I am a new Member of the House. I am most audacious even to ask your attention for this length of time. I am but an humble follower in the ranks of our party. It may be a wise thing for us, by this camouflage measure, to try to pull the wool over the eyes of the people. So I trust there will be no roll call. [Laughter.] My feeble "nay" when the vote is called for will not resound through these many doors, and my own constituents will not know how I voted, which will be a wise and fortunate thing, but I am going to vote "no," because, in the first place, I think it is a fraud on the public.

In the second place, I think, if it does anything at all in an economic way, it will increase the difficulties of merchants and lessen the supply of the food at the command of the people at critical periods, will interfere with the processes of business, and therefore do harm instead of doing good. And, sir, I trust that as we think over these things calmly we will all come to the conclusion that what is needed now is not legislation; what is needed to-day is knowledge. I submit that with my weak voice I can not command the attention of the country. There is one man who if he is restored to health, which we all desire and pray, can have the ear of the country. If he would forget his error in trying to stop the rising tide by the use of mere fiat, his inadequacy in asking us to pass statutes, he could, by using his boundless opportunities to get the attention of the people of the United States, tell them precisely what is before us, tell them that the remedy for this situation lies within the power of the people themselves; that only by thrift, by work, by sacrifice can they escape calamity. Thus he would do a service to his country greater than any that is entered upon his record. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever used in this act:
(a) The term "person" includes an individual, partnership, corporation, or association;
(b) The term "commerce" means commerce among the several States or between any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia and any foreign nation, or between any Territory or the District of Columbia and any State, or between any Territory and any other, or between any Territory and the District of Columbia, or within any Territory or the District of Columbia, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign nation;
(c) The term "cold storage" means storage in a warehouse as defined herein;
(d) The term "refrigerator vehicle" includes any car, vessel, or other vehicle, or portion thereof, which is designed and used for the transportation of any article of food at or below the temperature of 45 degrees above zero, Fahrenheit;
(e) The term "article of food" includes any article, except liquid food, that is intended or designed as food for human consumption;
(f) The term "warehouse" means any establishment or structure, or portion thereof, which is artificially cooled to or below the temperature of 45 degrees above zero, Fahrenheit, except (1) a refrigerator vehicle used as such, or (2) an establishment or structure or portion thereof used exclusively for storage of any article for the sole use of the occupant, owner, or maintainer thereof, (a) for consumption of himself or his family or guests, or (b) in his business of serving meals, or (c) in connection with his retail business only;
(g) The term "warehouseman" includes any person maintaining or operating a warehouse; and any person who rents and controls a room or space therein;
(h) The term "mark" and "marked" include stamp, brand, tag, or label, and stamped, branded, tagged, or labeled, respectively; and
(i) Any word shall import the plural or the singular as the case demands.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "food," insert "and ingredients or articles of food in process of manufacture, cure, or preparation."

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offer this amendment is because under this provision in the bill as it now exists the manufacturer of sausage or meat and all other such products will have to be marked with the cold-storage tag when placed in cold storage for consumption of the public. It seems to me that as long as you are excepting liquid foods it is no more than proper that you should except the foods that are placed temporarily in cold storage for 30, 60, or 90 days before they are manufactured into some other product.

I might say in many cases hams are placed in cold storage for a short time before being prepared for market. There is no question but that strips or cuts of hogs and beef are placed in cold-storage for a short time, sometimes for 30 days, before making sausage. I also understand that when canners—which is the beef that most of us refuse to eat, but nevertheless commonly used—when canners come into the great packing houses of the country they are often placed in cold storage 30 days, and then prepared and placed in the containers. Under the provisions of this law, it seems to me that it would be impossible for the manufacturers of cured hams and canned goods to place them in cold storage for a short time before being canned and cured without bearing the mark of cold storage. If you place them in cold storage after they are prepared it would destroy the food, because the canned meat and containers would not stand the temperature required therein. No one ever thinks of placing ham after it is smoked, or bacon after it is prepared, or sausage after it is made at any time in cold storage. To me it seems that it is very important that this provision should be carried in this bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the committee had under consideration the proposition of excepting every article of food that had not been in cold storage for 30 days. Under the bill all cold-storage food that enters interstate commerce must be marked, but the mark may be removed if kept in cold storage for less than 30 days. The suggestion of the gentleman is to exempt those foods. We undertook to exempt them, but, gentlemen, when you start in on exemptions where are you going to stop? We thought the better way would be to treat them all alike. Can anyone give a good reason why unwholesome food should be made into sausage, or anything else, and be disposed of to the public? As the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated, this is a health proposition. There is not much to the hoarding contention. Its aim is more to protect the people, the consumers, against unwholesome food and against ptomaine poison. Is there any reason, if we are to protect the people against unwholesome food, to allow such food after 12 months to be manufactured, as the gentleman from Illinois said, into sausage and dispose of it in that way? This has been discussed and considered from every angle.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I am just as much in sympathy with the cold-storage bill as the chairman is. All I am trying to do is to perfect, if I can, this very provision which I have provided for in this amendment; that is, not to compel the manufacturer of food products to place a stamp on the products in cold storage when it is not a cold-storage product, as it is only placed there temporarily. There is no danger of ptomaine poisoning in that. It is not to be there 12 months or 6 months, but placed there in order to manufacture in a short time. It does seem to me that it is just as essential to provide for food articles as for liquid food.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman's proposition is to allow it to be made into sausage and disposed of. If so, it could be left in cold storage 12 months and then manufactured into sausage.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the proposition.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Oh, no; I do not want that any more than the gentleman does.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman spoke of sausage and the ingredients——

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I just spoke of that as one thing. I am talking about hams, I am talking about bacon, I am talking about lots of articles that are in cold storage for a short time, and sausage comes in the same as anything else, of course. I have thought all along this provision should be in the bill and have so stated in the committee, as the gentleman knows.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. The food administrator of the gentleman's State, Illinois, appeared before the committee. He told about these scraps of tongue and the cheaper meats for which there is no demand at present when everyone is buying the highest priced meat. One concern had 125,000 pounds. They asked for an extension. He said, "No; dispose of it, unload it, so as to reduce the cost of living; put it on the market while it is wholesome." Now, under the gentleman's contention, it might be possible, after the food becomes deteriorated, to make it into something else and dispose of it. The question before the House is whether or not that is a proper thing to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I offer to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "guests," insert a period and strike out the remaining language in line 25 of page 2, and all the language on lines 1 and 2 on page 3.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, subdivision (f) of section 2 describes what a warehouse is and then makes certain exemptions from the operation of the law. Now, the law under section 9 provides they may hold these things which come through interstate commerce for a period of 12 months from the time they are placed in cold storage. In other words, the time of storage in cold storage is permissible for 12 months, but that does not apply in this bill to persons in the business of serving meals or persons who have retail stores. If this bill is to have any virtue at all in reducing the present high cost of living, it must come down to the ultimate consumer. The ultimate consumer of food gets his food in one of two ways. If he is a man of family, he buys his food from the retailer. If he is not a man of family, he lives at a hotel or restaurant. These particular provisions (b) and (c) of this section provide that the limitation of 12 months does not apply, and therefore one who has a large hotel in a city or a small hotel in a town—but, of course, the argument may best be followed by reference to a large hotel in a city—for large hotels carry immense cold-storage chambers, chambers of great capacity, and keep in cold storage different kinds of merchandise for as long as they will endure. I saw somewhere that there was a chicken or other fowl found in some cold-storage warehouse in a hotel that had been there seven years. Whether that be true or not I do not know. But there is no reason for exempting hotel men who must build a large refrigerating chamber and place in it fowl or meat which they may keep for a period longer than 12 months. I myself question very much the 12-month period, because if we adopt this 12-month period we are not going to get any food out of cold storage in time to relieve the cost of living except as brought to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], and that is that which is already now in storage and which will be there when this bill passes.

The retail dealer is the man from whom we all buy. He has a big refrigerator and ice box or some refrigerating chamber in the rear of his place of business. Under this bill he is to be permitted to keep his meat, his fowls, his eggs, his butter, anything that he can, in that cold storage for two, three, or four years, as long as the refrigeration can make them marketable. Now, in the hearings there is a question raised as to the length of time that this stuff is to be put in any refrigeration, and I shall discuss that later if I have the opportunity. But assuming 12 months is the standard, and we can assume that now because that is in the bill, why should a greater period of time be given to a retailer since he is the man who has to do with the ultimate consumer? It is time somebody should speak for the man who buys [applause], for the ultimate consumer, and not on behalf of those who seek to have legislation enacted for their own personal or private interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. I ask to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. It is for that reason alone that I ask that the same rule apply to the retail business man and to the hotel man that applies to every other branch of cold storage. The ultimate consumer, the humble man who goes to the corner grocery and buys his fowl for his Sunday dinner, or buys the meat for dinner during the week days, or who buys eggs for his family, is the man who is most affected by the present cost of living. In the very excellent report of the gentleman from New Jersey I see this:

The records of the Department of Agriculture as of July 1, 1919, show that there is a large increase in the amount of food in storage over the corresponding period of last year, yet with this increased surplus prices to the consumer have been mounting higher and higher.

That is the thing that is true. Prices to the consumer have been mounting higher and higher. And how are you going to reach prices to the consumer? You can not reach them through enacting laws that affect wholesalers alone; you must reach them by enacting a law which reaches the retailer, too, because it is from the retailer that the consumer buys his goods. There is no question about responsibility being divided between a large producer and a small retailer. The same elements of that shameless proceeding that we call profiteering may be shared by those up high and of small responsibility. And I say that if this bill is to be of benefit to the ultimate consumer, the man who buys the small amount of merchandise from time to time, it must be held to apply to the retailer. Therefore it would seem to me that there should be in this bill no exception of the retailer, nor should there be any exception of the hotel man or the restaurant man. Food that is in cold storage in a hotel or restaurant for 12 months has been there long enough, and I for one do not want to have to go to a hotel or restaurant and buy at very large prices food that has been in their cold-storage chambers for more than 12 months. And for a grocer or a retail business man, 12 months is long enough for him to keep his poultry and his meat and his eggs as against the needs of the ultimate consumer. So in striking this out all we would have would be a fair and equal and exact degree of responsibility for all people, and to the benefit of the ultimate consumer. In the light of what should be the true meaning of the bill, there should be no such attempted exemptions.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The distinguished gentleman's suggestion that striking these words out of the bill would have a tendency to decrease the cost of living convinces me that he has not seriously considered the bill. The object of the exemption, as it has been termed, is to exempt the retailer or the hotel man, and, knowing the gentleman has a knowledge of the law, I want to call his attention now to the fact that this Congress could not perhaps pass a law that would to any extent affect the average hotel man or retailer. But the object of the exemption is to exempt the hotel man, for instance, that buys some provisions and who has a little storeroom, from the necessity of marking the goods when they go into his storeroom and come out of it, and is to exempt a retail dealer that has a little storeroom from marking the goods he receives in interstate commerce as they go into the storeroom, and they can not compel him to mark them when they come out unless they go back into interstate commerce.

Mr. GARD. It is not only the marking of these products that this amendment refers to.

Mr. TINCHER. If he receives those goods in interstate commerce—and we can not regulate them unless they are so received—the marks are on them when he puts them in storage. When he takes them out to use himself, and does not put them back into commerce, Congress is powerless to enact any legislation with reference to them, if he simply takes them out of the storage for use in his own hotel or his retail store. If the gentleman's amendment prevails it means this, if it was possible to do it, to add another burden on business without doing any good, and add a little more to the cost of living. The committee had this matter up and considered it seriously. The gentleman mentions that he saw in the newspaper, I think it was, that they found a chicken in a hotel that was too old. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman does not mean to intimate that that was a unique instance? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARD. I said the newspaper article said that they found a fowl in cold storage in a hotel, and not a chicken. [Laughter.]

Mr. TINCHER. I do not think the amendment should prevail. The account that the gentleman refers to may have been something like about the time we began hearings on this bill. There was an account from the gentleman's own State that the Government had seized by libel eggs out there, and the matter received enough publicity that, without stopping to think, you would have thought that the Government had seized enough eggs to last the United States for months. But we had before us that day experts on the subject from the Department of Agriculture and from the cold-storage people, and when we figured out the number of eggs they had seized in the State of Ohio it was found that there were not as many eggs seized there by that libel, that created all that publicity and commotion, as were ordinarily sold for breakfast in the city of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That if any article of food which is required, or the container of which is required, by section 3 to be marked, is subdivided or transferred to a different container, the person who is liable under this act for any failure to have such article of food or the container thereof marked, shall mark such subdivision or container in the manner required by section 3.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask some member of the committee as to the marking of the article of food or the container. It seems to me if this act is to be beneficial the article of food should be marked if possible, but as I read this act the person putting the goods in cold storage might, even though the articles themselves were capable of being marked, place them in some container and mark the container, which would be a sufficient compliance with the law. Now, I realize, of course, that the committee does not want to go beyond the power of Congress under the commerce clause; but it seems to me that the option is such a broad one that it is possible that we are overlooking something that we might take advantage of by requiring that the article of food be marked; and, if not possible, that then the container should be marked. Is it the purpose of the committee to leave that optional?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Food is put up in so many different forms and in so many different kinds of containers that it would be almost impossible in the space of a bill to describe the different kinds of containers.

Mr. IGOE. I realize that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Or how the food should be treated. So all we can do is to view this matter in a larger sense and require that the container shall be marked. There are sections of this bill which provide that whenever the Secretary finds it is impracticable to mark——

Mr. IGOE. Section 7.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. These sections relate to the treatment of articles of food when it is impracticable to mark the article of food or the container in the ordinary way.

Mr. IGOE. That is, with the date?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. With the date, and so on. It is the intention of those who drafted the bill and had to do with it that there should be a general plan to be followed, requiring the marking of the container, and in case it is commercially impracticable to mark the container, the Secretary, by regulations, may provide some kind of marks or tags or labels on the food, not on the containers that the food is held in or shipped in.

Mr. IGOE. What I had in mind was simply if it was possible at first to have the article of food marked, it would be of more benefit to the ultimate consumer, because if only the container were marked there might be articles of food inclosed in the container, and when the container gets to a certain point the man handling them might take them out and thus all trace of the record might be lost.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The bill provides that if the articles of food are not in a container the articles themselves shall be marked. If they are put into a container the container shall be marked. As to a large majority of storage products, in the regular course of handling them, putting them into warehouses and handling them while there, or getting them into commerce and handling them while in commerce, those products—or articles of food, as they are described in the bill—are in containers. If not, then the articles of food themselves must be marked, and beyond the time the articles reach their destination and leave the original package, Congress has no power.

Mr. IGOE. I am afraid, I will say to the gentleman, that I see where the law could be evaded. It would be to make a container large enough to contain the articles themselves that might not be marked.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. When articles of that kind reach their destination in all probability they will be in containers, and when they have reached their destination they will no longer be in interstate commerce and will have reached the point where Congress has no further control over them.

Mr. IGOE. They may come to a large distributor and are in an original package, and on being taken out of the original package our control ceases.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WALSH. I do so in order to ask some member of the committee a question or two. First, with reference to the proviso in this section—

Provided, That the statement that the article is a cold-storage food may be removed in the event that before the expiration of 30 days following the date when such article of food was first placed in cold storage it is sold to the consumer thereof.

Does that mean that the label can be removed?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; the words "cold storage" may be removed.

Mr. HAUGEN. The words "held in cold storage" may be removed; not the date.

Mr. WALSH. What advantage would be gained by the removal of the words "held in cold storage" if the dates were allowed to remain? In other words, if you are going to permit the words "held in cold storage" to be removed, why not the dates also?

Mr. HAUGEN. There might be a prejudice against cold storage, but if anything has been in cold storage less than 30 days it might be considered as not having been held in cold storage at all.

Mr. WALSH. What significance would there be in the date of the article?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It would give information.

Mr. WALSH. That they were in cold storage?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not exactly; but the date would indicate. It would not be complete as to that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Of course, if they are taken out of cold storage, having been there less than 30 days, the words "cold storage" may be removed, but the dates should remain, so that it will not be reasonably possible or made easy, at least for the one receiving them, to put them again in cold storage, or those receiving them would have knowledge that they have been in cold storage and the length of time.

Mr. WALSH. Then that reason would apply equally to the removal of the date.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. We thought it would not be safe to permit removal of all marks, because there would be an invitation to those receiving the goods to disregard the fact that they had been in cold storage, though only for a period less than 30 days, and put them again into cold storage for the full 12 months. There ought to be some way to avoid or to prevent the violation of the law even to the extent of 30 days.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman answer another question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will if I can.

Mr. WALSH. How about marking such articles of food as fish, when sometimes large catches are put into cold storage to-day, and another batch to-morrow, and another lot the following day? Do they come under section 7, which provides for a written statement?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There are sections here which provide that the Secretary shall determine how articles of food shall be handled that can not properly or easily or practicably be marked, and shall provide the method of marking them or distinguishing them, so that they may be known to be or to have been in cold storage and the length of time. Now, as to just the method to be pursued by the Secretary, how he will work that out in all cases or in any given case, I do not know. Authority to take care of exceptional cases must be given to the Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Section 7 says he shall require, if he finds it to be commercially impracticable to mark them, that they shall furnish a written statement.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And that would be evidence of the fact that the product was in cold storage; that it was a cold-storage article.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the Secretary shall find it commercially impracticable to mark an article of food or a container as required by the strict provisions of the act, he may waive strict compliance and may require that the written statement conveying or pledging title to the goods shall contain a statement of the facts otherwise to be shown by marks, and such written statement shall be in such form and shall be preserved for such time as the Secretary may require. The Secretary will issue regulations to cover these matters. Many unusual and more or less difficult situations will arise. We can not write a law to meet every situation; we must leave much to the Secretary. He will, of course, anticipate many of these matters requiring regulations, and as others arise he will take care of them by regulations.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a motion that the italicized numerals and figures in this paragraph be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Strike out the italicized figures in section 3.

Mr. WALSH. I offer this motion to eliminate these figures—in parentheses, I should have said—because, Mr. Chairman, this will only tend to confusion, as I think. I understand that they are put in there probably to emphasize the different provisions of the section; but in coming to construe it or perhaps enforce its provisions and cite it in prosecutions I believe that it would just tend to confuse matters. It does not add much to the sense to read language and read a subdivision embraced within it. I trust the committee will not establish the precedent of inaugurating this somewhat novel way of dividing up sections of a statute. It is a new-fangled idea, and I do not think it is a good one. It has been followed in some jurisdictions, and I know that it has tended to confusion in the construing of laws. I trust the chairman will follow the custom that has prevailed here for several years and agree that in writing these statutes we will keep them in plain English, without these jump stops in parentheses.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman concedes that there will be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of them and that they will in no manner lead to confusion, I do not see any force in his objection, and it occurs to me that it may help in the construction and proper understanding of the section. Otherwise it is just a matter of taste. I may say that those who assisted the committee in drafting this bill, after the committee had arrived at the ideas to be put into words, used these numerals and figures in some places where the committee thought them unnecessary, or not proper to be used, and by direction of the committee they were stricken out; but in this section there are several distinct things that are forbidden, and we thought it would make the section more clear and help in the understanding of it if its provisions were divided in this way. But it is only a matter of taste, and that is to be determined by the committee, or by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated that these were the results of assistance which the committee had in framing this legislation. The gentleman need not have given me that assurance, because I know that there is no member of the great Committee on Agriculture who would of his own volition have thought of framing statutes in this way. But when you get assistance from some of the departments and outside of this body you will get more tomfool, high-fangled notions about writing statutes than you can keep track of. Now, I know the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] gets no clearer idea of section 3 with these things in it than he would if they were not there, and he has stated that they were eliminated from other sections of the bill.

Anybody who has read those sections will not, I think, be at much of a loss to understand what they mean. But in other sections they have been retained. I hoped by my motion to bring out the real necessity for employing this new departure in framing legislation. I have not quite found out as yet, and I do not see that it makes it very much clearer to subdivide it in this way.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture presents this bill after very careful consideration. I have been a member of that committee a number of years, and I know of no measure that has received closer attention by the committee, and no measure that presented in its main features and in its smaller features also more difficulties than does this bill. We would among ourselves determine a policy or a line to be followed, each member suggesting, perhaps, a different draft to carry that idea into effect. We would finally state our idea clearly to the gentlemen representing the drafting bureau and ask that it be put into words, and if it was brought back to us meaning exactly what we wished to have it mean it would be adopted. It was necessary to have some of these sections written and rewritten several times. Some of them came back to us divided off with figures and letters as this section is, the one to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers. In very few of them have we retained those letters and figures. We retain them here because there are several distinct and separate propositions, several different offenses, and we thought it would be inadvisable to strike out these subdivisions.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If you are going to subdivide them, then subdivision (i) should be subdivided again, because it contains two things, "ship" "or deliver for shipment in commerce." Then subdivision (iii) should be subdivided, because that is "sell" "or offer for sale." Logically it should be subdivided for each one.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman is trying to carry it to a ridiculous extent, and asks the committee to consent to something that would be farcical. We have carried it far enough, perhaps too far already.

Mr. RICKETTS. I take it that the purpose of the person who drew this bill was to subdivide this section in this way because each one of the subdivisions sets forth a separate offense against the Government; and, in order that a court might clearly understand which provision had been violated, he has sought to designate them separately by these numerals. I want to say to the gentleman that this is a not uncommon practice in my State. It is a very common practice in matters of this character, where a penalty is imposed, and each subdivision is a distinct and separate offense.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. These subdivisions and these separate letters are not necessary. It is largely a matter of taste. We struck out some of them and retained some of them. In this section we thought it better to retain them. That is all we have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, or some other member of the committee, if he can state in a general way what character of food will be affected by this measure?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Everything that goes into cold storage, except liquid food.

Mr. GARRETT. As a practical proposition, are there any vegetables produced that go into cold storage?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think vegetables are rarely put into cold storage and frozen. This provides only for those foods that are kept below 45° Fahrenheit by artificial means.

Mr. GARRETT. That would not be freezing; 32° is freezing.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Thirty-two degrees is the freezing point, but cold even as high as 45 affects almost like freezing some kinds of vegetation.

Mr. GARRETT. I have this in mind, if the gentleman from Michigan will bear with me. Certain treatment is accorded certain vegetables as, for instance, tomatoes. Perhaps it is necessary to retain them at a station for a few days. I do not know what degree of temperature they are subjected to, but if they should be put in a warehouse for a week or 10 days pending their being shipped and placed on the market, if the warehouse should happen to be at a temperature less than 45°, would it be necessary for them to be marked?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Not unless they are in interstate commerce.

Mr. GARRETT. If they are going into interstate commerce. I do not know that that ever occurs. The vegetable industry in my section is a considerable industry. I do not know, but I am anxious to get definitely in my own mind whether or not these products would be affected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. My impression is that products of that kind, under conditions stated by the gentleman, are not put into cold storage and that this law would not reach them.

Mr. GARRETT. They are not put into cold storage for the purpose of keeping them any considerable length of time. Necessarily the raw vegetables must go on the market within a limited time.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It would seem to me that under the conditions to which the gentleman refers they would not be covered by this bill.

Mr. GARRETT. The thing I am after is that I am anxious that the bill should be in such a condition that where there is no purpose of storing them, other than keeping them a few days, the producers will not be annoyed by having to go to all the trouble of marking them.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The committee's desire to carry out the purpose that the gentleman expresses caused the committee a great deal of trouble, because we know that goods, the like of which go into cold storage, are gathered together and kept in storage for the purpose of getting a quantity together before they are shipped, and kept only temporarily. But if we were to permit those goods to be put in only temporarily, without any regulation or notice being taken of them, they might remain there a long time, and improperly or without regulation get into interstate commerce. There would be an opportunity for evasion of the law. So, when goods are taken out that have been there more than 30 days, they must go out with all the marks on them. If taken out before 30 days the mark "cold storage" can be removed. The dates when they were put in and taken out must remain, so that if they go into cold storage again the one who receives them may know that they have been in cold storage, and the length of time they have been in added to the amount of time they will later be in cold storage must not together be more than 12 months.

Mr. GARRETT. No articles are affected by this except those that are kept in a warehouse or chamber or other place where the temperature runs below 45 degrees Fahrenheit?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is the fact.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, after the word "storage," add the following words: "and the selling or market price at which the article of food or contents of the package went into cold storage."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to make the point of order ultimately?

Mr. ANDERSON. I shall make the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I think we had better have the point of order disposed of, as I do not want to discuss it unless I can get a vote on it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I shall press the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not want to do a vain and useless thing by talking on the merits with the point of order pending. What is the point of order?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That it is not germane.

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order on the ground that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, after the word "storage," add the following words: "and the selling or market price at which the article of food or contents of the package went into cold storage."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I anticipated that a point of order might be made to this amendment. I am not sure that the point of order is not well taken. The purpose of the bill is expressed in the title, although the text of the title is not always conclusive on the proposition of germaneness. It is—

To prevent hoarding and deterioration of, and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The Chair will notice that the amendment is offered in connection with the regulation of conditions in which cold-storage products may be transported in interstate commerce. In addition to the terms and stipulations provided in the section, I simply add another regulation under which articles may go into interstate commerce. The point of order would be well taken if it was attempted to fix the price of commodities, but this it does not do. The purpose of the amendment is to give information to the consuming public on cold-storage products. The amendment but adds another detail to the regulations under which cold-storage commodities are allowed to be transported in interstate commerce. It seems to me that in that view of the case it is germane to the general purposes of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, of course, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] states, the title of the bill in no way determines whether an amendment is germane to the bill or the paragraph to which it is offered. Clearly, many an amendment could be offered which would be germane in the sense of coming within the general purview of the title which would not be germane to the text of the bill in the sense in which the rule of germaneness applies. This bill seeks to regulate cold storage so far as cold storage can be regulated, and within the limits of the interstate commerce power of the Constitution. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama seeks to go very much further than to regulate cold storage. It has no relation whatever to cold storage——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. ANDERSON. It would be as germane to the section if the bill did not relate to cold storage at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman will admit that the purposes of this bill are not related entirely to the details of cold storage, but it also goes further and undertakes to regulate the terms under which those commodities may enter into interstate commerce. The regulations which it provides say that it shall be stamped plainly, "Cold storage," and the date when put in and when taken out of cold storage.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is in error about that. It is not possible, as the gentleman well knows, for Congress to regulate cold storage directly. If it were possible, I will say to the gentleman that many of the difficulties which the committee met and had great trouble in overcoming would not have been met. We could only regulate cold storage in the sense of requiring certain things to be done as a preliminary to the entrance of the articles into interstate commerce; but the bill specifically relates and is confined to cold storage, while the gentleman's amendment seeks to regulate—or, at least, by requiring additional marking to regulate—the price of the articles themselves. This bill in no way deals with the price of the articles, nor pretends to do so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not a fact that the real basic principle lying behind this whole proposition aside from its legislative technical aspects is for the protection of the consuming public against the profiteer?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I should say not. It may be that when this committee first undertook the consideration of this bill it had the idea it was possible to meet the President's suggestions with respect to the reduction of the high cost of living by legislation of this kind. But if we had that sort of opinion, I think it was very thoroughly dispelled by the testimony and consideration they have given.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The title of the bill states that it is for the purpose of preventing deception with respect to cold storage. Now, if there is a date——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I trust the Chair will listen to this suggestion being put, because I think it is rather determinative in this matter.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If there is a date put on the article when it is put in cold storage—we will say eggs—I think that the gentleman himself could judge better as to the actual time when the eggs went into storage from the price on them than from the date, because there might be fraud as to the date. Here are men attempting to keep eggs in cold storage 15 months rather than for 12 months. It may be a very easy thing to change the date. But if you have further the requirement that the price be put on, does not the gentleman think that would be a further and better means to detect the fraud?

Mr. ANDERSON. If I should judge of the condition of the eggs in the city of Washington by the price on them, I should say they are all fresh eggs.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Oh, well, the price does vary from time to time.

Mr. ANDERSON. As my friend here says, notwithstanding the fact that some of them are rotten.

The CHAIRMAN. The object of this section is to identify the goods that are in cold storage, and the chief method of doing it is to determine how they should be marked. The language of the section is "marked in accordance with this act or the regulations under this act—'cold storage.'" The marks of identification are the date, together with the name and the location, and this amendment intends to add one other item, viz, the price. These marks of identification having already been put in the bill, in the opinion of the Chair, it will be germane to add this other, the price of the article, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. To discuss the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not want to take up the time of the committee if the Chair is ready to dispose of this matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I assume that the Committee on Agriculture, with its usual diligence with reference to legislation of this character, gave thought and consideration to that phase of the situation presented by my amendment. I assume that especially because it will be recalled that in the message of the President delivered to the Congress here, I believe on August 8, among other suggestions made along the line of reducing the cost of living to the people of this country was this identical suggestion that is incorporated in the proposed amendment. I am among those who doubt very seriously whether or not we are going to be able to accomplish any very material results for the benefit of the people attempting to affect the general laws of supply and demand by legislation of this or any other character. As I understand it, we should not attempt to destroy the legitimate operation of that great economic law, for to do so would destroy the very foundations of our agricultural and industrial prosperity. What we are attempting to do is to remedy a situation that is, as a matter of fact, hampering the law of supply and demand by evil and illegitimate practices like hoarding and profiteering in its immoral sense.

But, assuming that Congress is going to make an honest effort in this new field of legislative enterprise to reduce the cost of living and to cut out a large element of profiteering that is now going on, or is presumed to be going on—I say, if we are going to enter upon that field at all, we should put as much vigor into these statutes as it is possible for us to conceive. And I believe that one of the great things that makes it possible for the ultimate consumer to be profiteered upon in this country and pay large and exorbitant prices for the necessities of life is the fact that he is, in a large number of instances, absolutely ignorant of the real value of the article; that he does not know what legitimate margin of profit is involved in the transaction for the middleman, for the man that lies in between the original producer of the article and himself; and it seems to me that if we put this provision in here requiring these articles that are placed in cold storage, in addition to having "cold storage" and the dates when they went into and came out of cold storage stamped upon them, as provided in this bill, to have plainly stamped upon them the market or selling price of the article in that market or community when placed in storage, that weeks or months afterwards, when taken out and put into commerce and reach the ultimate consumers and they can see plainly marked upon them the date and the market price of that article in the primary market, it will afford a decent basis upon which to estimate for themselves a legitimate margin of profit the seller should charge them for that article, after allowing a decent and reasonable profit for the middlemen——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman, in the closing sentence there, said, "Put on the market price," but in a former statement the gentleman referred to the selling price and the cost and all that. Now, which price would you put on? Suppose a farmer produces his own eggs and brings them and puts them in cold storage, what price would you put upon them?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The spirit and purpose of my amendment is to put onto the commodity the prevailing price in the market at that particular time when placed in storage. For instance, if eggs were selling in some community for 40 cents a dozen for that day, let that price at that time when they go into cold storage be marked upon the article or upon the package in which it is contained.

I desire to test the sentiment and judgment of the House upon this matter, which it seems to me will put more teeth into this statute and will really afford the consumer some decent information by which he can in a measure protect himself. The President earnestly urged the adoption of this suggestion. Without its incorporation I fear there is not much to hope for from the bill if passed.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

As long as our civilization prevails we are going to have people engaged in various kinds of business and industries. That is what makes a great civilization. Under the stress of the times, when we are confronted with the high prices we pay for everything, it would be a dangerous propositon to write into law something that will do exactly the opposite of what apparently it would do on the face of the law we are proceeding to write.

If an egg dealer is forced to stamp the purchase price of every case of eggs he buys on those cases, you are not going to have any egg dealers. They will go out of the business. They are in the business because of the profit they expect to make. They assume the burden and the risk of the business in which they are engaged. They assume the risk as to what the market is going to be. And when they are accumulating from the farming sections of the country these eggs, as an illustration, and putting them in cold storage for the purpose of ultimately shipping them to the consuming market, they do not know what those consuming markets are going to be. Accordingly, there is a great element of risk in the business. And if you authorize them to stamp on every case of eggs the purchase price of those eggs, in the very nature of the business they will go out of it. Then what will be the result? You will leave the farmers of the country without a market in which to place these eggs.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has in mind, of course, the reservation of the President that the goods should be marked with the price of the first cost?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I remember that reservation. The President is just a man, just as we are men. I come from a producing section of the country. My people raise things which other people must have to live upon, but in order for my people to produce they have got to have a primary market, and you will destroy that primary market if you cause the primary seller to put a price on his products. If you destroy that primary market you will destroy the productive capacity of the country, and both producer and consumer will go down in the same boat; starvation will be here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In what way would this destroy the primary market?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will answer it in this way, that if I were a purchaser I would not buy if I had to stamp the price on the article I had to purchase.

Mr. TINCHER. If this amendment prevails and the price is to be stamped on all articles that go into interstate commerce—of course, we can not make them stamp it on all articles—would it be equivalent to saying to the producer, "You can not have interstate commerce as to your production"?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. It goes in cold storage, it is true, and there is where the stamp is necessary; but the stuff is produced on the farm, and you are going to destroy the primary markets of the farmer and drive him out as a producer, and thereby you will increase the cost. I have had enough of price fixing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana rose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] may have five minutes. He was promised the time in the general debate, and did not get it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman desire to discuss this amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. No. I think he desires to discuss an outside subject.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us have a vote on this amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, on the 6th of September I made a few remarks on the permanent generalship of Gen. Pershing.

I felt as an American citizen and as a Representative of the people my patriotic duty, and for no other reason, to do what I could to thwart the ambitions for the Presidency of a man whom I believed to be absolutely unfit for that office. And I thought it my duty to make such bold protest as I could to point out that he was securing the indorsement of this body to that end. I have thereby called down upon my head torrents of editorial villification from all over the country, from men who seemed to think that it is a crime for a man in the minority to stand for what he thinks to be right and oppose what he believes to be a menace to his country.

In God's name, what are public men for if they dare not speak their minds, even though they must stand alone and have their motives distorted and twisted to fit the purpose sought? No; I have no personal animosity. No; I was not headed off from going to the front. No; I do not believe I misrepresent my people. They believe that truth ought not to hurt. No; I was not an antiwar man.

I realized that it was a thankless job and not a sagacious political move to oppose the tremendous mob tide of created public opinion; but somebody had to be the goat.

And my reason for objecting was not that rewarding an officer would foster militarism, but rewarding an unworthy officer, an un-American, unrepresentative officer. It is in spite of, not because of, Gen. Pershing that the big job was well done. Other officers of the Army upon their merits are entitled to far more recognition.

In the glare of the fierce fighting at the front the service of our Navy in this great victory has been overlooked. The part our hero had in winning this war compares in no way to the responsibility or part Admiral Wilson, for instance, took in this war. The man on "the Wilson front," whose vitality, comprehension, ability accomplished unheard-of miracles in successful transportation of soldiers, conquest of submarines, victualing and coaling France, England, and Italy. "Lafayette, nous voici" would not have been possible without him and his organization. He found France years and years behind the times in dockage, harbors, and transportation facilities. He was "there," on the job, and yet, withal, a human being. His men love and respect him. We have had a great victory, and, of course, the people must have a hero, however unheroic or feeble as such that hero may be. Will anyone refer to one heroic act this hero of heroes has performed?

We have been told, with much "nicety of dovetailed English," that we went into this war to down kaiserism, junkerism, Prussianism, militarism, and to make the world safe for democracy. Militarism is a hateful thing, whether it leers beneath a Prussian helmet or an English visor, but it is most out of place in any uniform of the United States of America. That military caste that makes one soldier black another soldier's boots; that relies upon a small shoulder bar plus insolence and overbearing swagger to compel obedience, rather than the possession of respect-winning qualities; this outcropping of vanity that forces a company of marines to step back off the road into an icy stream, and stand for one hour saluting an empty car riding up and down the road, while the general watched from a window to see that it was done; that hateful thing that is all summed up in the words "For officers only"; this notion that an officer who maybe at home was your shoe clerk, or your neighbor's son, or your schoolmate, by the magic of a tin badge becomes some kind of a little god, and a private soldier becomes some kind of a yellow dog, is pernicious, deadly dangerous, un-American, an aping of that very European military caste we say we have been fighting to put down. It does not make better discipline. Men of worth can compel discipline. Men without it, using such methods to free American spirits, do not know the harm they have done. This treatment has shattered many ideals, soured good, honest patriots.

When the finger of fate fell on them millions of young hearts left their work, their school, their homes, their loved ones, their future prospects, and quietly fell into place in the great machine of war.

They were not looking for snaps or favors. They did not have any illusions that it was a picnic excursion. They went willingly, knowing that war had never been so fiendish nor various in its forms of agony. They were not niggardly in spirit. We must not let them find us noisy and free of words but tight in the pocketbook when they come back. We have flung money right and left in this war. It has been squandered unrighteously if the truth could ever be heard and remembered. But this is a sorry place to stop and economize. Better go a little slow on all this European stuff and do a little justice at home.

All honor and thanks and substantial gratitude to the men who fought and won the war, and to the leaders who shared their danger and their hardships, who were there to say "Come on, boys," not "Go on, boys, and I'll be back here where I can't be harmed, for you couldn't possibly win if I should happen to be shot."

All honor to the boys, our splendid soldiers, sailors, and marines, the best fighting stuff in the world. To think of their deeds and the modesty with which they bear their honors makes us bursting proud that we are Americans, and each of us should do our little to keep that kind of a country from falling under the leadership of men who will not treasure our ideals, our traditions, our institutions, our liberties; and it should be and is the patriotic duty of every red-blooded American to strike, and strike hard, at any un-American candidate who by imitations of European tactics and duplicity has wound himself to the topmost mast and there hangs hissing at the nobler men below.

We gave the common soldier $60, which does not even give him a new suit of clothes at present prices. Their old jobs are gone. They can not get others right away. They have lost a year or more, and are out of touch with the current.

We will need those boys again some day, maybe; and if we do, what will they remember our gratitude to be? That to one man, who never got his spick-and-span uniform mussed in the mud of the trenches, we give a raise in pay of $2,500 a year and propose a $10,000 gold sword; and, again, if certain men could have their way in aping European customs in giving everything to the Army aristocracy and but a few cents to the common soldier, we would be called upon to vote a half a million as a present, as a token of honor, and thereby duplicate the kingdoms of Europe, the chains of whose customs our forefathers gave their lives to throw off; and to guarantee that this tyranny should not be inflicted upon their descendants, by Constitution they forbade any officer of trust or for profit in the United States to accept a title from any foreign potentate or power. Yet the English knight, Sir John, has powerful friends, who intend to put him over as President of the United States.

In my speech of September 6 I referred to a certain general who was a faithful henchman of Sir John's, Gen. Harts, in charge of the prison camps of Paris, and of Pershing's advertising propaganda, known as the visiting bureau. And in support of what I had to say of this gentleman at that time I wish to have the Clerk read the following.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

GEN. HARTS BLAMED—IGNORES CRUELTIES IN ARMY PRISONS, REPRESENTATIVE BLAND SAYS—APPALLED BY CONDITIONS—INVESTIGATORS ALSO FOUND MISUSE OF UNITED STATES FUNDS IN FRANCE—CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE BACK IN NEW YORK DECLARES MEN RESPONSIBLE FOR "HORRIBLE AND REVOLTING TREATMENT" OF SOLDIERS ABROAD WILL BE BROUGHT TO FORUM OF PUBLIC OPINION.

[By the Associated Press.]

NEW YORK, September 26, 1919.

Bringing a report of "outrageous cruelties perpetrated on American soldiers" in prisons of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, the congressional committee sent overseas to investigate tales of Army "prison horrors" arrived here to-night.

Conditions in Army prison camps were found "very bad," with special emphasis laid on prison camp No. 2, near Paris, the committee stated.

"Conditions were appalling," Representative BLAND said. "Nothing like this treatment of our men had ever been known before in the history of the American Army. We have copies of records, reports and testimony of inspectors, courts-martial officers, so as to be enabled to definitely fix responsibility."

Representative BLAND said that Gen. Harts for months was in the same building, at 10 Rue St. Anne, where thousands of outrages were committed. Lack of food, heat, and air and nauseating sanitary conditions were before his eyes, and the reports showing their conditions were on file in his office, Mr. BLAND said.

The Representative added that Gen. Harts was the military guardian of the President, and "no man in the Judge Advocate General's or Provost Marshal General's departments had the boldness to recommend his trial before a court-martial or efficiency board."

WILL BE BROUGHT TO JUSTICE.

"Three facts stand out," said Mr. BLAND: "First, that the most horrible and revolting cruelties existed; second, that the higher officers responsible have not been made to atone for these wrongs; third, that no reasonable excuse for the same has been offered by the War Department. It is clearly up to them."

Mr. SCHALL. No wonder Pershing refused to be questioned by this congressional committee in Paris before he had secured the indorsement of his conduct of the war by Congress. They undoubtedly would have asked him why he reduced the sentence of "Hard-boiled" Smith. He might be asked why the medical officer in charge of prison farm No. 2, who, when found guilty of most brutal treatment to prisoners, of refusing them medical treatment, of exposing them to most vicious forms of infection, and when sentenced to be dishonorably discharged from the service, was restored to duty by general headquarters and allowed again to resume charge of the lives of American soldiers. He might be asked why he issued the order that the bodies of the American boys who fell in France should not be restored to their folks in the United States of America. He might have been asked why, after the armistice was signed, he issued the order to the troops on their march into Germany that everyone who fell out should be counted as deserters. Why these strenuous marches, where the officers were ordered not to allow anyone to take care of the boys who fell by the wayside through exhaustion? These courageous young Americans, 16, 17, 18, 19 years old, who would rather die than give up, trudged on under heavy packs until they fell from exhaustion. When doctors loaded them into ambulances, orders from headquarters hauled them out and forced them to trudge on or get on as best they could. Many of them, unable to go farther, fell in their tracks, and when doctors, who, after camp had been made for the night, unable to stand for this inhuman régime, had secured ambulances and lanterns and sneaked back to look for the lost of their flock, they found them frozen to the ground, covered with snow, many beyond help, and others dead.

This kind of a fellow for President of these United States? Not for me. If that is poor taste or personally insulting, then make the most of it. And I know of about 2,000,000 other good reasons why he should not be President.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for the declaration of war, the selective-service act, and every measure tending to the vigorous prosecution of the war, and I risked my political scalp in upholding the hands of the President by voting for the Democratic organization of the House in the Sixty-fifth Congress; so that the thought is ill founded for anyone to say that my action in objecting to granting a permanent rank to the English knight, Sir John J. Pershing, or to the giving to him of a gold sword is playing petty politics in an effort to square my war record. Nor have I any personal feeling in the matter except that prompted by the love of my country, her ideals, her traditions, her institutions, her liberties.

I realize that a gold sword would be very appropriate, in that it is the best metal with which to represent caste, pomp, tyranny, vainglory. And in character it is soft, pliable; in color, yellow; but as to actual value of merit, I feel that tin would be more appropriate and a more serviceable metal than gold for a fighting man, for with it one could do some execution resembling the nature for which it is made. But a gold sword is fit only for parlor use, with which to pierce the hearts of the ladies. Very appropriate. And if it were not for the $10,000 it would cost the people, I would say, "Fine; just the thing."

My critics condemn me because I have not exploited myself in the Congressional Directory, and wonder how such a benighted and misguided individual ever got into Congress. If these scribes had been as diligent as their loud-sounding phrases would indicate, they might have picked up a few facts concerning my short and unillustrious career. I am grateful to the editor of the National Magazine, especially at this point, who in the April number wrote of me kindly, and I respectfully, in the extension of my remarks, submit the article:

BLIND CONGRESSMAN VISITS ALLIED BATTLE FRONT.

The striking example of the capacity which enables a man to rise superior to the limitations ordinarily imposed upon his usefulness to the public welfare by the handicap of blindness is afforded by the record of the splendid political achievements of the Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL, Member of the Sixty-fourth, Sixty-fifth, and Sixty-sixth Congresses from the tenth district of Minnesota, of whom Theodore Roosevelt once said: "I believe in TOM SCHALL with all my heart."

Twelve years ago he lost his sight from an electric shock, but continued in the practice of law in Minneapolis, where he had established his office after having been admitted to the Minnesota bar in 1904.

The necessity for concentrated attention has made Mr. SCHALL'S memory very quick and retentive. He is a magnetic, fluent, and versatile speaker, with a rare gift of humor, and the ability to "get" and hold his audiences. As CHAMP CLARK has said of him, "He is a cracking good speaker." He personally managed and conducted his three campaigns for Congress, making 237 speeches in the first one, nearly all of them outdoors. Elected the first time as a Progressive, in the following campaign he was sent by the Republican national congressional committee to open the campaign in Maine and Indiana, where he met with great success.

Returning to his own State, he was barred by a technicality of the State law from filing as a Republican, the State machine opposing his filing against the wishes of the Republican congressional committee. All three parties—Republican, Democratic, and Socialist—opposed him in a lively scrimmage, but he won by 9,000 over the Republican candidate, who was second, and in the recent election, on the Republican ticket, had a majority of over 25,000 over his Democratic opponent.

The opening of the war Congress found the House so evenly balanced that five independents, of whom Mr. SCHALL was one, held the balance of power. Feeling that unity of action and speed in organization was vital to our success in war, Mr. SCHALL disregarded precedent and, in a speech that was notable for its high patriotism and disregard of party lines, nominated a Democrat—CHAMP CLARK—for Speaker. Had his vote and one other been different, the speakership contest might have been long delayed, as it takes a majority to elect. Speaker CLARK was elected by one over a majority. In a former close speakership contest the battle dragged out for months. Had such a contest been inaugurated at the beginning of the war Congress it would have been fatal to our success in the war. Had our boys not arrived at the exact moment when they did, unsupported by supplies and artillery though they were, the Germans undoubtedly would to-day be in possession of Paris. Mr. SCHALL took the position that it would add to national efficiency for the President to have a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate, with whose committees he was familiar, to work with him, instead of changing organization, with the danger of losing a single step at so vital a time.

Mr. SCHALL made a trip to the battle fronts last summer during the final days of the Chateau-Thierry drive, was across from Fismes the day before it was taken, and was on board the Mount Vernon when it was torpedoed by a submarine.

He has a lively interest in the rapid progress of the events of the world, and was greatly diverted by his trip in an aeroplane last winter with Gen. Lee, of the British Royal Flying forces. He asked to be taken up a second time, as Gen. Lee, not being just sure what he would want, gave him a nice ladylike ride, without any flip-flops. The general, who had been very polite but rather bored all the afternoon, taking up a Senator and a Shipping Board man and various others, looked at him with interest and grinned with boyish pleasure. Then he abandoned his British calm and gave him a "regular" ride with plenty of thrills. "That is the first sport I have had since I lost my sight," Mr. SCHALL said when he came to earth.

He is a member of the Rules, Flood Control, and Expenditures in the Navy Department Committees, and enjoys the esteem and confidence of the entire membership, regardless of party, as is shown by the fact that the Republicans have renominated him for the powerful Rules Committee of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be very difficult to ascertain what is the real character and underlying purpose of this bill. I understood the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to say, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], that its underlying purpose was not an antiprofiteering purpose. Now if that be true, then certainly the committee does not deserve the strictures that it has received at the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], who, after denouncing the absurdities, as he styled them, of the suggestions made by the President, proceeded in effect to criticize in vehement fashion the committee for acting upon these absurd suggestions and reporting a bill to make them effective. If the suggestions of the President were absurd, as intimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, then what should we say of the Committee on Agriculture which, with knowledge that these suggestions were absurd, are now seeking to enact absurdities into law? Why have they treated these absurd suggestions seriously, thereby inviting the strictures of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

I was much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, though I could not give assent to his pæans of praise of the profiteers. I understood him to say that he would proceed to laud them in much more extravagant terms if he only had had the courage to do so. So far as I could follow the gentleman, he seemed to think that if this country only had a few profiteers possessing the powers of Pharaoh, with a Joseph to advise them, and these profiteers should buy up and store all the corn, wheat, meat and other foodstuffs, and hold them until the people were reduced to the straits of the people of Egypt of the time of Joseph, so that they would sell their personal property, their lands, and finally their liberties for food, the public generally would be much better off than they are at present. [Laughter.] At least that is a fair deduction from the extravagant eulogy of the gentleman from Massachusetts upon the operations of that historic profiteer Pharaoh, ably aided and abetted by his prime minister, Joseph.

With respect to the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], that the public will not buy goods if they know the original price of the article they are buying, I must say I can not agree with the gentleman in that suggestion. If the bill is carried out, then an easy way will be afforded of finding out from the date on the stored article the market price of that article as of that date. Hence anyone who is curious on that line can find out what was the original price of the article which he proposes to purchase, and in that way secure the same information that would be directly afforded him should the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama be adopted. I do not think there is any indisposition on the part of the public to buy an article after they are advised of the price of the same, provided the price they are to pay involves only a reasonable profit.

Every man who buys at a retail store knows that he is paying a profit to the retailer, and in many instances it is not difficult to ascertain precisely what the retailer has paid for his goods in the first instance. Very often he will tell the buyer. The purchaser knows perfectly well that the dealer has his overhead expenses, and he is willing to pay an advance even when he knows what the retailer has paid, provided the price that the retailer asks is reasonable and affords merely a reasonable profit. Such knowledge does not deter a man from making a purchase. He knows that in the ordinary course of business a profit is charged, and the purchaser must pay it.

The real ground of the objection on the part of the gentlemen who oppose this amendment is that it provides a positive and ready means of calling to the attention of the purchaser the extent of the profit that in many instances he will be called upon to pay. If the public at large is advised in this direct and positive fashion that they are being called upon to pay an unreasonable profit on an article that has been held in cold storage, such an outcry will develop that the unfair selling price will be reduced, under the pressure of public opinion.

Under such conditions the profiteer, if such there be, will not dare to insist upon an unreasonable advance upon his cold-stored products. Hence if this is an antiprofiteering bill, this amendment will give effect to that purpose. Not that I believe that on the whole, this bill will deal very efficiently with the evil at which it is supposed to be aimed, but this amendment will be more effective as an instrument against the profiteer than any provision in the bill.

There is some difficulty, as I said, in ascertaining whether this is an antiprofiteering bill. But if it is a bill of this character, and it is designed to be efficient, then I do not see how anyone opposed to profiteering can oppose this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, rising to oppose the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, I wish to pay my respects to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], if I will not be out of order in so doing.

I trust the amendment will not be adopted. It is a matter that received the very careful consideration of the committee. We heard arguments pro and con and decided to put nothing into the bill and to have nothing to do with any matter that does not relate directly to the simple subject of cold storage. I have never thought or spoken of the bill except as a cold-storage bill. If its enactment shall result in anything helpful to the people, in lowering prices of food products they have to buy, well and good; but it is a cold-storage bill, in my judgment, pure and simple, let the results of its operation be what they may. It is proper and absolutely necessary to encourage cold storage, but it is just as necessary to regulate it so that it shall not be abused. Now, I am going simply to suggest that there are, it seems to me, insuperable difficulties in the way of placing the market prices of goods and products upon them when they are put in cold storage, and if we undertake to follow that line and require it, it will be practically impossible. I think it will be unjust, too, for reasons that will suggest themselves to the committee. I think it would be an unnecessary and therefore an improper interference with business. For one I am opposed to further and continued interference with business by the Federal Government. I wish to see the business and the business men of this country let alone for a while and the hands of the Government taken off just as soon as possible, so that things may resume a normal condition. I am not in favor of any price-fixing proposition nor shall I ever be in favor of any unnecessary regulation of business. I conceive the proposed amendment to be an attempt to regulate and interfere with private affairs of men respecting these great products and this great business, to regulate and interfere unnecessarily and in a manner that can not but result in failure. This course of procedure ought not to be entered upon. The amendment should not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 3, line 20, after the word "storage," add the following words: "and the selling or market price at which the article of food or the contents of the package went into storage."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a word about that. I move to strike out the last word. I was called out for half an hour to keep an engagement that I had made, and except that I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman who last spoke I have not had the advantage of hearing what has been said about this matter. What knowledge does it give to me as to the real value of an apple to know the price of a barrel of apples or a smaller quantity of apples grown in the Shenandoah Valley, or in Oregon, or in Illinois, going into cold storage and then coming to me when I go and buy a bushel or a peck or any other quantity? It is 3,000 miles across to Oregon, some distance to the Shenandoah Valley, and a thousand miles to Illinois. They have cold weather and they have loss from oversupply or undersupply, and we must pay three or four profits to the farmer, to the orchard man who bought, to the man who shipped, and to the man who bought from him; so that when the apple gets down here to Washington I pay about 10 cents apiece for these fine apples, bigger than your fist, grown in Oregon, or better still, a Shenandoah Valley apple, which I believe is better than an Oregon apple. And I am told that they raise very good apples down in southern Virginia. This amendment would impose a useless expense and trouble, because nobody can tell what the real value of the apple is when it comes to the ultimate consumer, and there is no way in which you can regulate it, in my judgment, except to get back under the law of supply and demand and through competition.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, only a few weeks ago we appropriated nearly $3,000,000 for the Bureau of Markets. The Bureau of Markets is furnishing this information as to the market price of foods from day to day, and anybody who desires to be informed as to the market price can ascertain it by referring to the reports of the Bureau of Markets or to any daily paper in any locality. Nearly every small weekly paper in every locality gives the market price for the week or for the day in that particular locality. It seems to me it would be an unnecessary expense to require the marking of prices, which seems to be of little value, if any.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, all the pro forma amendments will be withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 14, noes 53.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RICKETTS: Page 3, line 22, after the word "stored," insert a period. Strike out the provision beginning with the word "provided" and ending with the word "thereof," inclusive.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have never offered an amendment to any legislation that has been before this House since I have been a Member of it, although I have had the pleasure of voting many times against amendments and many times in favor of amendments that have been offered. But I offer this amendment in good faith.

Under the title of this bill you will find that it is to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage food. Now, it is proposed by this provision to allow the party who sells the goods to the purchaser to cut out the marks of identification of cold storage. That can have but one purpose only, and that is to deceive the purchaser.

You and I know that when our wives give an order for goods if they are going to buy cold-storage goods they want to know it. If they are going to buy fresh goods, they want to know it, and in all probability they will make the inquiry. This gives the party the right to keep the goods in cold storage for 30 days, then take them out, cut off the cold-storage mark, still leaving the date on them to identify the article, and you will, by cutting it out, allow the party to deceive the purchaser. The party can take the same goods and sell them to me or any customer as fresh goods and thereby deceive. I am not going to be a party to any deception or fraud.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. It is my understanding that the 30 days' limit was for the purpose of giving the opportunity to place food, a little at a time, in cold storage, but not to be held there, probably for two or three days, not more than 30 days, simply in order to get a carload or quantity of it, and that it should not be called cold-storage goods.

Mr. RICKETTS. The bill provides that it can be kept there for 30 days. Who is to be the judge of that fact? Who is to know about the date except the fellow that puts it in the cold storage?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. The date is put on it when it goes in.

Mr. RICKETTS. By whom?

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it not a fact that food kept in cold storage for less than 30 days is fresh food?

Mr. RICKETTS. No: I would not think it was.

Mr. HAUGEN. They have that legislation in all the States that food in cold storage for less than one month is not required to be marked.

Mr. RICKETTS. It is not a fresh article. The party who sells that article to your family or to my family or any other customer will sell it as fresh goods.

Mr. HAUGEN. They are very fortunate if they get it less than six months old.

Mr. RICKETTS. That is one of my reasons for offering this amendment. I do not think we ought to give a man the right to deceive anybody. If the purpose of the bill is to prevent deception, why not make it a good clean bill to start with? It is not that now.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. What time would the gentleman fix?

Mr. RICKETTS. I would not fix any time. When you allow a man to put goods in cold storage, you put the date on it and mark it cold storage when it is deposited; you do that because you want to designate the article as a cold-storage article. If he keeps it in there 20 days, or 25 days, or 30 days, you allow him to take it out and eliminate the cold-storage marks and put it on the market as fresh goods. Why do you do it?

Mr. TINCHER. The committee thought that 30 days was a reasonable time; that up to that time they were practically fresh goods. Would the gentleman say three days or five days?

Mr. RICKETTS. Let me ask the gentleman, Did not the committee think the goods would sell better to the customer if the cold-storage marks were removed?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. No; the committee did not think it worth while to put a man to that expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. In the general acceptation of the trade goods are not considered in cold storage unless they are there more than 30 days. In these days a purchaser is fortunate if he gets goods that have not been in storage more than 30 days; they are as fresh as he will get.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Why did the committee require that it should be designated cold storage and give it the date when deposited?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The Federal Government can not require that they shall be marked in the first instance. Congress has no authority over it. All Congress can do is to say that they shall not be shipped in interstate commerce unless they are marked, and so forth. We say if goods are taken out in less than 30 days the words "cold storage" may be removed, but after 30 days all marks shall remain. It would not be safe to permit the removal of all marks, especially the dates, because it would open the door for fraud. It would allow the owner to take the goods to another warehouse and keep them there the full term of 12 months. It is absolutely necessary to have some privilege and some limitation on this to enable one who collects the goods, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROOKS] says, to collect goods in small quantities so as to have a carload and ship them early, in less than 30 days, and then he shall not have to retain the stamp of cold storage. If there were no privilege or allowance whatever, a creamery making one day's run of butter, putting the product into cold storage, a part of its own plant, could not take it out without having it marked permanently as cold-storage butter, with all the dates. The gentleman would not wish to permit that situation.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Do goods deteriorate in one month in cold storage?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Very little.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In two months?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That depends on the kind of goods and the treatment of them.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman suggested milk.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; I did not suggest milk; milk is not covered by this bill. I suggested butter.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That will answer the purpose. If the butter goes into the creamery to-day and is stamped as cold storage and comes out in two days, why should it not carry the fact that it was in cold storage for two days?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is just as fresh as it possibly could be, and should be shipped and enter the trade with as little handicap as possible, if cold storage be considered a handicap.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Why should not the stamp be allowed to remain on it showing that it had been in cold storage two days? That is the contention that it is as fresh as ever.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Two days is about as short a time as one can possibly collect goods and get them into interstate commerce, and there should be as little burden as possible placed upon the ordinary and very prompt way of doing business, but dates should remain to prevent fraud, as I have said.

Mr. SWEET. Now, the gentleman has stated that the goods which were in storage 30 days were considered cold storage.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; 30 days or more.

Mr. SWEET. Now, in the ordinary course of trade or business goods that are in storage for 30 days are considered cold storage. Is that an arbitrary rule that has been adopted by the committee or is it well recognized?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That may be called an arbitrary rule adopted by the committee, but we are following the practice and general understanding with reference to these matters.

Mr. SWEET. It is a universally accepted ruling?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Quite generally accepted, yes; it may, I think, be called universal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As to many commodities there is a difference between merely preserving them by putting them in cooling, as in a refrigerator car, and freezing them for keeping. This bill does not recognize that difference and does not have it in view apparently, but as to many kinds of produce there is a very marked difference. Now, as to a product which is merely kept cool there is no hastened decay by the refrigeration when it is removed, but as to many kinds of products when they have been frozen and then taken out of refrigeration and allowed to thaw out there is a quick collapse; the collapse is greatly hastened by the fact that it has been frozen.

Now, these products which have been in frozen storage for 30 days are in a very different condition after being taken out and allowed to thaw from what they would have been had they not been cold stored at all and had been sold when fresh, and produce which has been cold stored is far different from such produce when fresh. Therefore if anyone purchases produce which has been frozen—the kind which deteriorates rapidly after being thawed out—with the belief that, in fact, it has never been in cold storage and has never been frozen, a fraud is perpetrated upon that purchaser. For that reason, and a very excellent reason, as it seems to me, we ought not to allow the people who have goods in this condition to make such sales, working thereby a fraud upon the purchaser, and that is what we are opening the door to here. The truth hurts nobody. The man who has had goods in cold storage ought to be willing to say so, whether it is for 24 hours or a year. He ought not to be allowed to put his goods out as different from the kinds of goods they really are.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In a moment. I insist on the standard of truth and accuracy being applied in commerce, and we ought not to squint at anything else.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no deception in this. Does the gentleman contend that because some one put a crate or basket of peaches in cold storage overnight that he should be compelled to mark them "Cold storage," and ought there not to be some line drawn somewhere?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say this to the gentleman: That if he should put the peaches in some cooling place merely and take them out the next day they would remain as good as fresh ones; but if he should store the peaches at a temperature, we will say, of 32 or 33 degrees, and then take them out they would collapse very quickly; they will not last nearly as long. Therefore the man who sells a basket of peaches that has been in refrigeration near the freezing point for 30 days and sells it to some one who believes they have been recently plucked off the tree and have not been so stored is perpetrating a fraud upon the purchaser.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is no fraud and no deception.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We ought not to open the door to fraud. The proposition in the bill is that a cold storer of produce is allowed to take the label off, and can thereby deceive the man who desires to purchase. I insist that the truth hurts nobody who wants to do right.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to ask the chairman a question relating to the pending section of the bill. Does this section contemplate that these inscriptions shall be put upon each separate article as soon as it is put into cold storage?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I would like the gentleman to point out what portion of section 3 requires that this shall be done?

Mr. RICKETTS. Lines 17 and 18.

Mr. HAUGEN. It says "that it shall be unlawful for any person to ship or deliver for shipment in commerce," and so forth, without marking. Of course, if it does not go into commerce it is not required to be marked, because Congress has no jurisdiction except over interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that the inscriptions must be made before the article can be shipped in interstate commerce, but the question that I asked is, Does this bill specifically require that the moment that an article is put in cold storage, these inscriptions shall be placed upon it?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not unless it is in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then you can withdraw an article from a cold-storage warehouse without inscribing it at all?

Mr. HAUGEN. If it is sold in the State; but if it goes into interstate commerce and has been in cold storage more than 30 days it must be stamped as required.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I call attention to the fact that lines 23 and 24 seem to contemplate that the inscription has already been placed on the article before it is withdrawn, but that it may be stricken off, provided the article is sold within 30 days from the time it went into storage.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; even if it enters interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But if the inscription is not required to be placed on the article when it goes into cold storage, then there will be nothing to remove when the owner makes sale within 30 days.

Mr. HAUGEN. It does not apply to the State, of course—that is, intrastate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In other words, and it is this to which I desire to call the gentleman's attention, there is nothing in the section that requires that a party placing products in cold storage shall inscribe the same at the time they are placed in the warehouse.

He is merely required to make this inscription when he offers the goods for shipment in interstate commerce.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is a good enough lawyer to know that we can not require it before it is put in interstate commerce; but this requires that when a shipment has previously moved in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. My inquiry was whether all the articles hereafter stored in cold-storage warehouses shall have the required inscriptions affixed at the time they are put in storage. The gentleman agrees that this is not required, and that these inscriptions need not be impressed until the goods are prepared for movement in interstate commerce. I agree with the gentleman in this statement.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is not under this bill until it is interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. HAUGEN. Under the definition of law.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Take a concrete case. I am a farmer in Virginia. I put a thousand barrels of apples into cold storage in Washington, and later I wish to take them out; will they carry the date at which they went into cold storage?

Mr. HAUGEN. For interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not say anything as to that. I merely wish to take them out——

Mr. HAUGEN. If they are not in interstate commerce then.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have the right to take them out.

Mr. HAUGEN. You can take them out and sell them in Washington, if they are not in interstate commerce, but you can not offer them in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Have I not the right under this bill to take those goods out of cold storage, without putting any inscription on them?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly; unless they are in interstate commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. So the legal effect of this section is that an owner is not required to put these inscriptions on his goods when he places them in cold storage; but that after they have been in cold storage the goods must be inscribed as required before they are shipped in interstate commerce. But the gentleman must admit that the goods can be withdrawn without any inscription. I call his attention to the fact that this right of withdrawal without notation of the fact that they are cold-storage products, and the date on which they were received in the warehouse, opens the door wide for fraud, and abuse of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY), the committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he finds it to be commercially impracticable to mark any article of food or the container thereof with the exact date as required in the clause (2) of section 3, may permit the day, but not the month or year, to be omitted from such mark. Such date shall then, for the purpose of this act, be deemed the first day of such month.

Mr. RAKER, Mr. KING, and Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska rose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw the motion and yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, this cold-storage bill now under consideration has been carefully drafted in response to a growing demand on the part of the public for wholesome legislation on this subject. The fact that approximately 26 States have now adopted some form of cold-storage legislation shows how extensively public sentiment has been awakened. Inasmuch as a majority of the States of the Union have already enacted such legislation, it is only fair and reasonable that Congress supplement the legislation of the States with laws that will successfully regulate cold-storage products in interstate commerce.

Time forbids my attempting to mention the many reasons that have entered into the evolution of public sentiment on this subject, but I desire to mention three principal reasons.

First. Many cases have been observed where at different times certain cold-storage warehouses have been in insanitary condition so as to be unfit for the storage of food products. This bill seeks to correct this undesirable condition.

In the second place, some instances, at least, of the undue holding and hoarding of food products are a matter of record. By limiting the time that food products may remain in cold storage to 12 months the danger or possibility of hoarding is eliminated by the provisions of this bill.

The third reason for demanding such legislation is partly psychological, yet nevertheless reasonable. The public, owing to the immense growth of the cold-storage business and the gradual concentration of the distribution of the food supply into fewer hands, have increasing fear that the time may come, though it has not now arrived, when the entire food supply of the country may be completely controlled by a few great concerns, and that the only way to save the consuming public from such a great calamity is to adopt legislation of this kind in time to avert the approaching danger.

The attention of the committee should be called to the fact that this bill in no way attempts to interfere with the legitimate business and processes of cold storage. That the preservation of food by cold storage is of inestimable value to the public is a universally acknowledged fact. The freshness and wholesomeness of the food is preserved by this process to a degree and in a manner that could not be realized in any other way. The carrying over of the surplus food supply during the months of heavy production to the time of scarcity, thus equalizing the supply throughout the year, has a tendency to stabilize prices to the producer and, under proper distributing agencies, lower the average cost to the consumer. When, however, the food surplus of any given year is held in storage so long as to place it in competition with the new crop the legitimate purposes of cold storage are defeated, and the old crop has a tendency to force down the price of the new crop to the producer, which is admittedly unfair. Such a condition directly hinders the operation of the law of supply and demand.

In this bill the chief object of the time limit of 12 months is that the food may be carried over a sufficient time to take care of the months of little or no production and at the same time be entirely out of the way when the new crop comes on the market.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, you will observe by a study of this bill that it is clearly and solely a cold-storage measure, and as such it is only fair to say, as the hearings of the committee will verify, that the bill seems to meet with the approval of the cold-storage warehouses, the packers, producers, and all concerned. So far as I know, there was not a single witness before our committee who offered any objections to the provisions embraced in this bill. It is the belief and hope, therefore, of the Committee on Agriculture, that the House will pass the bill substantially as drafted and as early as is consistent with careful consideration.

As to whether or not the passage of this bill will have any immediate or material effect in reducing the high cost of living, I have my sincere doubts. I believe, looking to the future, that the provisions of the bill, when enacted into law, will stabilize prices, and during the seasons of new production at least result in increasing prices to the producer, and the bill is therefore desirable from this standpoint.

The present high cost of living, however, is in the main the result of deep-seated conditions growing out of the war program that can not be remedied by this or any other immediate legislation. The increase of the volume of the world's currency from $15,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000 constitutes the principal reason for prevailing high prices. When money is exceedingly cheap everything else is dear in proportion.

Another principle underlying cause of high prices is the fact that the world has been engaged for over four years in a systematic program of destruction which has resulted in a world shortage. Any material or permanent reduction in the price of commodities will be realized only by a gradual reduction of the volume of currency and a universal program of increased labor resulting in increased production. Work, work, and more work will finally solve the problem. In my judgment the strikes and threatened strikes at this critical time are not only unwise and injudicious on the part of those engaging in them, but they are a direct and serious handicap to the public welfare, and constitute a menace to the life of our democracy itself.

While there are no doubt cases here and there where laborers are underpaid and where the conditions under which they labor are not the best, yet it must be acknowledged that wages and labor conditions are the best proportionately at this time that they have ever been in the world's history. There are so many converging conditions entering into the present serious situation that it behooves everyone in every walk of life to be thoughtful, patient, and considerate until we can unravel the intricate and tangled legacy that the war has bequeathed us and determine just what is needed to meet the emergency.

Mr. Chairman, I have always been in thorough sympathy with those who toil, having myself enjoyed and endured the advantages and disadvantages experienced by laboring men. I have worked on the section at $1.10 a day and boarded myself. I know what it means to work 10 hours a day as we did then in a deep railroad cut where no wind was stirring with the sun boiling down to the extent of 110° or even more. These experiences certainly enable me to see some of the laboring man's problems from his own viewpoint and to have an insight and experience that some others may not have. But notwithstanding such experience, I am completely out of sympathy at the present time with any strike movements or strike suggestions until such a time as we can retrieve ourselves from the serious and multitudinous abnormal conditions in which the war has tangled us. Anyone who attempts at such a critical moment to tie the hands of the Government or bring further hardships, either directly or indirectly, on a long-suffering public, is, to say the least, either uninformed or very ungrateful.

But in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that while the bill may not have a direct effect on the high cost of living, owing to these general conditions I have named, it will nevertheless render a great public service by insuring the sanitary condition of cold-storage warehouses, by placing food on the market before the new crop comes in so as not to be in competition with the same.

In a word, the bill will further the purity and wholesomeness of food, prevent the possibility of hoarding, and so supplement State legislation on the subject as to bring proper cold-storage advantages to all of the people in every part of the country. I commend the bill to the House with the hope that it will receive early favorable consideration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KING: Page 4, line 9, after the word "month," insert the words:

"Provided, That every retail dealer in foodstuffs in the District of Columbia shall keep conspicuously displayed in close proximity to all cold-storage foods offered for sale by him a sign plainly marked with the words 'cold storage': And provided further, That the management of all dining cars operated in interstate commerce and of all restaurants and eating places in the District of Columbia, and serving cold-storage food, shall mark in plain letters on all their bills of fare opposite the name of such food the words 'cold storage.'"

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is just being read for information, is it not? The gentleman can not offer it, because we have not read the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 4 has been read. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] make the point of order?

Mr. ANDERSON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of, and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Nebraska, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BEE, for 10 days, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 29, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we give Thee thanks that we are facing the problems of this day in health and strength, in vigor of body and mind, with a clear conception of duty and with a determination to face it without fear or favor. We thank Thee that we have the courage born in us of deep convictions. We pray that Thou wilt guide us in all the affairs of state, that we may so discharge the duties of the high office to which Thou hast called Thy servants in this Senate that they may realize God's favor and see the pleasure of the Lord prospering in their hands. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have here a letter sent out by the national committee on the churches and the moral aims of the war, which reads as follows:

[National committee on the churches and the moral aims of the war. The committee—Mr. Hamilton Holt, chairman; Rev. Henry A. Atkinson, D. D., executive secretary; Rev. Linley V. Gordon, associate secretary; Hon. William H. Taft, Hon. Alton B. Parker, Mr. Glenn Frank, Mr. William H. Short, Rev. William P. Merrill, D. D., Mr. George A. Plimpton, Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, D. D., Rev. Sidney L. Gulick, D. D., Dr. Talcott Williams, Rev. Arthur J. Browne, D. D., Mr. Frederick Lynch.]

70 FIFTH AVENUE,
New York, September 22, 1919.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: This committee, as you undoubtedly know, carried on a very extensive campaign in behalf of the war. It has been clear from the very beginning that the war would not be won, and the moral aims for which it was fought achieved, until a league of nations is established. A determined effort is now being made, however, within the United States Senate to defeat this necessary end.

Public sentiment alone will convince our Senators that America is resolved to help put an end to war by helping to control the forces which make war inevitable.

It would seem that the churches had done everything possible to impress the Senate with their determination to have the covenant adopted, but in the present exigency we feel that they must make one final effort. Anything less than this would be to fall short of our duty.

There are four things which can be done which will be of inestimable value in this crisis and which may turn the scale and save the covenant.

(1) Write to your two Senators and send a copy of the letter to the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. Make your letter brief but emphatic, asking for speedy ratification of the peace treaty, including the covenant for a league of nations without any amendments which would send the treaty back to Paris.

(2) Influence at least 10 of your most influential friends to do the same thing.

(3) Arrange for a community meeting or a meeting in your church where the matter may be discussed, and a new set of resolutions adopted to be sent to the Senators and to the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE.

(4) Preach one more sermon on the subject.

Inclosed you will find copy of statements made by leading church bodies and a leaflet by Dr. Frank Crane.

I am also inclosing a postal card asking for your signature and permission to use it in a monster petition that is to be sent to Congress. If you will sign this card and mail it so that it will reach me by return mail, we shall very greatly appreciate your cooperation.

Yours, in behalf of a league of nations,

HENRY A. ATKINSON, Secretary.

P. S.—Please sign and mail the inclosed postal card at once.

The postal card, addressed to Secretary Henry A. Atkinson, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City, N. Y., is as follows:

I am in favor of a league of nations and hereby give you permission to sign my name to a petition that is to be presented to the Senate, which reads as follows:

"We, the undersigned clergymen, urge the Senate of the United States to ratify the Paris peace treaty embodying the league of nations covenant at the earliest possible date without amendments or such reservations as would require resubmission of the treaty to the peace conference and Germany."

Signed ——— ——— Church ——— ——— Address ——— ———

Date ———.

To be of value this card must be signed and mailed at once.

It will be observed that the card says, "I am in favor of a league of nations," and then it proceeds to ask them to sign a card urging the Senate "to ratify the Paris peace treaty embodying the league of nations covenant."

Mr. President, I will not weary the Senate by reading the names attached to this letter, or at least what we call a letterhead, but there are the names of the committee and the name of Mr. Hamilton Holt as its chairman. I ask that they may be printed with the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply call attention to this matter to show the organized propaganda by which these associations and societies are attempting by stereotyped and hysterical appeals to bring pressure upon Senators, who know probably quite as much about the treaty and its good and bad points as those know who are asked to sign this literature, already manufactured for them in advance, and to preach sermons about the league.

One gentleman to whom the letter was sent replied as follows:

DEAR SIR: Permit me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 22d instant.

I desire to impress upon your mind that I am conscientiously opposed to the league of nations, and I regard it as the most infamous document that ever was written by any group of nations. It is not necessary for me to specify, since the honorable Senators who oppose it in Washington very well voice my sentiments.

Sir, I am a hundred per cent American, and I am entirely dedicated to the proposition that America shall be for the Americans, and that the rest of the world should fight its own battles as our forefathers fought them in the past.

I listen only to the voice of Washington, of Jefferson, of Monroe, and of all the great men who held dear to their hearts the purity of Americanism. And inasmuch as they, by their careful policy have conducted this Nation to a glorious success, I can not consider advisable the substitution of glory by the doubtful outcome of the league of nations.

I supported Mr. Wilson with my whole strength during the war, because I recognized the justice of his leadership at that time. Now he has gone too far with himself, and while he and the Government are not of one mind, while he chooses to impose on the American people that which I consider not good for them, I will do my best to oppose him as far as my condition will allow.

I assure you, sir, that I appreciate your communication since I presume that you are prompted by genuine sincerity.

Yours, against the league of nations,

———— ————.

Dak., inclosing a resolution adopted by the Yankton Association of Congregatonal Churches of South Dakota, indorsing the covenant for a league of nations and requesting its adoption without reservations or amendments. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH,
Beresford, S. Dak., September 25, 1919.

The Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As scribe of the recent meeting of the Congregational Churches at Centerville, S. Dak., I am instructed to forward to you the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Yankton Association of Congregational Churches, composed of 25 churches, and including 2,486 members, representing the Congregational interests of the southeastern part of South Dakota, hereby indorse the pact of the league of nations at present pending before the Senate and urge its adoption without any reservations or amendments that would necessitate its resubmission at present.

"That the scribe be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to the Hon. EDWIN S. JOHNSON and the Hon. THOMAS S. STERLING at Washington."

Respectfully, J. B. BURKHARDT.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SENATE ROLL CALLS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Pursuant to the notice I gave on Saturday, I offer the following resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 199) was referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XII of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"4. When the roll is called, either for the purpose of taking the yeas or nays or for ascertaining the presence of a quorum, the result shall not be announced by the presiding officer until at least 15 minutes shall have elapsed after the beginning of the calling of the roll, and every Senator who answers to his name within that time shall have the right to be recorded."

LANDING OF MARINES IN DALMATIA.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Chair. Has there been any response from the Secretary of the Navy to the resolution of inquiry that I introduced last week referring to the landing of American marines on the Dalmatian coast?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been none.

Mr. KNOX. I note this morning what purports to be a statement of the facts following that landing. It seems now to be pretty generally conceded and there is no doubt about the fact that troops landed from an American vessel of war. The Washington Post in one of its leading articles this morning is responsible for the following statement:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 29, 1919.]

FACTS NOW ESTABLISHED.

The following important facts appear already established:

Secretary of the Navy Daniels, who last week said he could not believe that American sailors were being used in the manner described by press cables, now has official confirmation of the news.

The orders to Rear Admiral Andrews, commanding the American naval forces in the Adriatic, came from the British Admiralty via the war council and Rear Admiral Knapp in London.

The approval or disapproval of the American Navy Department was not asked, and the details of the expedition would perhaps have not reached Secretary Daniels had he not cabled specifically to Rear Admiral Andrews, stating that remarkable reports were appearing in the newspapers and asking if they were true.

WITHOUT DANIELS'S KNOWLEDGE.

Mr. Daniels was admittedly placed in a peculiar position when cables reached here stating that the forces over which he is presumed to have exclusive control were carrying on what amounted to naval warfare without his knowledge. It was fully realized that the British Admiralty might desire to issue orders to Rear Admiral Andrews to act on behalf of Great Britain and her allies, because the situation required sacrifice on the part of some nation if D'Annunzio's followers were to be held in check.

It was further realized that under the new league of nations plan foreigners would be in a position to direct American naval forces in emergencies with or without the consent of the American Navy Department. But as the league is not yet sanctioned by the United States and control of America's armed forces has not yet passed out of the jurisdiction of the American people, it was not believed possible that the American Navy could be directed to undertake a warlike expedition without the consent of the head of the American Navy.

It may have been for this reason that Secretary Daniels was so sure that the reports in the press could not be correct until he had official confirmation.

Mr. President, I can appreciate the doubt in the mind of Secretary Daniels when that startling report first came to our shores. I can appreciate how the head of the American Navy would feel when it was publicly charged that marines, exclusively under the control of his department, had been landed upon foreign soil for the purpose of carrying out the wishes and the desires of any nation. I can understand how a further doubt might have disturbed his serene mind, and that is as to whether or not this was only the first number of a program to which we may be secretly committed in the way of military and naval activities in Europe.

It had been my intention, Mr. President, this morning to have presented a resolution for a thorough investigation of the whole situation, but I was informed that such a resolution had been prepared by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW].

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question before he takes his seat, if he will allow me to do so. As indicative of the danger of operating the Army and Navy of the United States in this haphazard, unauthorized manner, I wish to ask the Senator what sort of a situation we would have been in if the marines who were landed had been opposed and had been killed by the people whom they were trying to put out of the city of Trau?

Mr. KNOX. If they had been opposed and conflict had ensued, we would have been carrying on a war against them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without a declaration of war by Congress.

Mr. KNOX. I have heard of no declaration of war by Congress.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me to correct him, we would have been waging peace with them as we did at Vera Cruz.

Mr. KNOX. That, perhaps, is another name for it. The terms have become considerably confused within the last two years; but certainly, under the old-fashioned definition as to what constitutes an invasion, we would have been invading their country; and if we had shot down their citizens in order to make good the ground that we had gained in that invasion, we would have been carrying on war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That would seem to me to be the situation.

I wish to call attention to the fact that the dispatches I have seen, as reported in the public prints, are to the effect that the admiral who landed the marines, who interfered in this situation in Dalmatia on the Adriatic coast, states that he did so under the orders of a supreme council sitting somewhere. I am not aware who represented this country on that supreme council, but I call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the unbelievable state of affairs when the Army and Navy of the United States are ordered around Europe and Asia at the behest of some supreme council, a body utterly unknown to the Constitution of this country, and a body in which the people of this country have no confidence whatever.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if it be in order at this time, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 198), as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the newspapers of this date that a force of American sailors or marines were landed on the Dalmatian coast from a vessel of the United States Navy by direction of the British Admiralty and without the knowledge of the President, the Secretary of the United States Navy, or other competent authority of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Department of State be requested to inform the Senate of the facts concerning this report at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, inasmuch as the resolution which I have sent to the desk calls for no more than a statement of the facts in the case, I apprehend there will be no objection to its immediate consideration, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, withholding for the present an objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution. I want to ask Senators who are agitating this question if they are operating upon the theory that we have entered into any peace settlement? As I understand, we are now in exactly the attitude in which we were at the time of the signing of the armistice. We have made no peace settlement, and no peace settlement has been made nor will be made until a sufficient number of the first-rate powers have signed the treaty to put it into effect.

It is well known that during this period the supreme council, under the war powers of the President of the United States, was formed for the maintenance of a semblance, at least, of law and order; and for the temporary preservation of the status in Europe. The United States, as I understand, participated with the same nations with which it had been associated in the war, and in this particular case, though all I have is press reports, the reports state that that particular work on the Dalmatian coast was allotted to the United States. Great Britain has had allotted to her certain other work, and Italy has had allotted to her certain other work. Italy is confronted by something which partakes very much of the nature of a revolution; and the only purpose of the action of the American marines in this case is the purpose that they have had from the beginning, and that they have had since the armistice was signed, of maintaining the conditions as they then existed. I can not understand why Senators are going on the assumption that we have arrived at a state of peace. We can not arrive at a state of peace until the treaty is ratified by France, Italy, and the United States.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. We are not in a state of war with Serbia or Italy, are we?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

Mr. McCORMICK. Or engaged in suppressing insurrection in Italy, are we?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are not in actual active war, but we certainly are not in a state of peace——

Mr. McCORMICK. With Italy?

Mr. LODGE. With Italy?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I do not understand why Senators proceed upon the theory that either the Navy or the Army is under any other control than it was during the war. During the war the Secretary of the Navy did not issue orders from Washington for every movement of the Navy over there. The Navy operated in conjunction with the navies of Great Britain, of France, and of Italy, and orders were not issued from Washington for every landing of marines or for every movement of every vessel.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. When did we go to war with Italy?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have not gone to war with Italy.

Mr. LODGE. It is the Italians that we drove out of Trau.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts must know that the Italian Government has practically agreed with the United States and that the Italians who are in Fiume and on the Dalmatian coast are now practically in insurrection, which the Italian Government is not able to suppress. I do not think the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. Did the Italian Government ask us to drive the Italians out of Trau?

Mr. HITCOCOCK. I am not advised what the Italian Government did, but I am advised that the Italian Government and the French Government and the British Government and the United States Government are practically in accord as to the policy that should be pursued on the Dalmatian coast and with regard to Fiume, and that the situation is complicated by what amounts to an insurrection of the Italian troops. There is no difficulty; our relations with the Italian Government are entirely amicable; our ambassador is in Rome; our diplomatic relations are in entire accord, and there is every indication that the Italian Parliament stands squarely behind the Italian prime minister in the arrangement which he has made. The only trouble is with some Italian insurrectionists, and whatever the United States has done in this case has been done by the order of men over there who have been issuing such orders for months, and there is no reason why that condition should be changed in the face of insurrection and lawlessness.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he would regard the situation in his home city such as to require the use of marines or the Army to put down lawlessness or insurrection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If there is disorder——

Mr. MOSES. Should we ask——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will answer the question.

Mr. MOSES. Should we ask the people of Italy to come here and do that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The United States is fortunately perfectly capable of handling the situation within the United States.

Mr. MOSES. And most people, accordingly, Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator not to interrupt me without leave.

Mr. MOSES. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The United States is perfectly capable of maintaining law and order within its own borders, and I believe that the Government of Italy is able to maintain law and order within its own borders; but its borders are not on the other side of the Adriatic. That is not Italian territory, and the Senator knows it very well.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator may.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator regard the action that has taken place at Trau and which is evidently about to take place at Fiume is for the purpose of protecting the existing territorial integrity and political independence of Fiume?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is not, and the Senator knows very well it is not. It is simply for the purpose of maintaining the status until the joint agreement which has been made by the United States can be carried out. There has not been bloodshed upon the part of the United States; there has been nothing but the landing of marines to preserve order, just as under every administration the landing of marines has been ordered on the Western Hemisphere in countries contiguous to us.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Does the Senator think that under any statement of conditions or facts there is an impropriety in the United States Senate asking for the facts concerning this matter? Does he not think it true that the fact that there has been no bloodshed in connection with the landing of American troops is due rather to good fortune than to any other circumstance? As the Senator from Illinois very aptly inquired, when did we go to war with Italy or when did we go to war with Serbia, or why should the United States armed forces be used upon the authority of any foreign government or any supreme council or any agency other than the one established by the Constitution of the United States for interference in the affairs of a friendly power? Is it not true, notwithstanding the fact stated by the Senator from Nebraska, that while the Secretary of the Navy and the President did send the naval forces of the United States upon the high seas during the recent war and that they did things, perhaps, without direct and specific orders from the President or the Secretary of the Navy, they were so sent for cooperation with our allies against our enemies and not against our friends and allies?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will say in answer to the Senator that I have not any objection to proper inquiry at the proper time. Inquiry has already been made, which I presume will be answered in due time under the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I do not think it is within the dignity of the Senate of the United States to harass the departments with inquiries with which we are very little concerned. The Senator speaks as though we were invading Italian territory. He knows very well that our troops have not landed on Italian territory. I now ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I simply wanted to ask a question. It may be too late. I wish to ask either the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Nebraska whether the Italian Government or any other Government has protested against the landing of our troops?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will answer the question. So far as I know, no protest has been made or recorded or even announced from the Italian Government or from the Jugo-Slav Government. The question propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts to the Senator from Nebraska is a very pertinent one in this discussion. Of course we are not at war with Italy. We have not been, and I hope we never will be; but, unless my recollection is at fault, when the Fiume situation became critical and the Italian Government was threatened in consequence——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a minute further?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Suppose the landing of our marines there was done by direct or indirect request of the Italian Government for the purpose of temporarily preserving law and order there. Could that be called an act of war against Italy?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, if it was done pursuant to a request of the Italian Government, it could not be an act of war under any circumstances.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. This does not concern Fiume at all. This is the city of Trau, on the Dalmatian coast, and the people who were driven out were Italians; so it could hardly have been done at the request of the Italian Government.

Mr. THOMAS. But, Mr. President, this is one of the consequences of the Fiume incident, so far as we are able to judge from the information at hand. Fiume was placed practically under international control by express or tacit agreement consequent upon the attitude of Italy on the one hand and Jugo-Slavia on the other regarding the ultimate disposition to be made of it, and it was garrisoned by small numbers of British and French troops, both of which were driven out by D'Annunzio when he made his spectacular entrance into that city and proclaimed it a part of Italian territory. That incident was an unfortunate one, an unlawful one, and one which, but for the exercise of great tactfulness, might and probably would have resulted in bloodshed, followed by a situation of extreme international delicacy, and one which might very easily lead to the renewal of war.

As has been said by the Senator from Nebraska, the war is not yet technically over, and the occupation of Fiume was not Italian or Jugo-Slav prior to D'Annunzio's entry. Since that time the Italian Government has been in a very critical situation between the desire of the Italian public to retain Fiume and the very evident breach of faith committed by D'Annunzio, and which the Italian Government under the circumstances naturally hesitated about either repudiating or affirming. According to the morning dispatches, the Italian Government has received a vote of confidence, and can no doubt handle the situation more intelligently from now on; but I feel very sure that the landing of our marines in Dalmatia was due to this unfortunate international situation, and until Italy or Jugo-Slavia or both shall protest it seems to me very much like a tempest in a teapot.

With regard to the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], unless my recollection is greatly at fault a similar resolution was introduced last week and by unanimous consent was immediately adopted. It seems to me, therefore, that we should give the State Department a little time, and assume that it is both willing and anxious to reply, before bombarding it with another resolution. If I am at fault in my recollection, I hope some Senator will correct me. I do not think I am. That being the case, I ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I neglected to state while I was on my feet that the territory in question is Austrian territory, which was to be placed under the military and naval authorities of the nations which were associated together in this war. Until its fate is settled it has got to remain under those authorities, and we have got to bear our share of that burden.

Mr. THOMAS. Those are the facts; and of course the arrangement, whatever it was, was necessary to be made, and must be observed and enforced until final adjudication of this territory shall have been made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the resolution has gone over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, has the resolution been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It went over under objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Indiana seems to me highly appropriate. Before yielding the floor I shall introduce a joint resolution which I have on my desk, which will cover not only this specific instance but future use of the Navy in Italian waters or elsewhere on like conduct.

It seems to me that we ought not only to check this present activity of our naval forces, acting apparently without the direction of any established authority in our own country, but to provide for future activities of a like kind.

Mr. President, this is not within the exercise of the war power of the President. In reality it is action under the league of nations. If there be any authority outside of the United States to give directing power to the naval forces of the United States, it must be by virtue of the league. We hear, in press reports, of the supreme council having given directions to that part of the American Navy which is in Italian waters to take the conduct covered by the resolution. In that event it is either an unwarranted exercise of authority by the council of the league of nations or by some one of the nations already supposed to have ratified the treaty in order to be within the operation of the league. In either event it is not within the war powers of the President. The league covenant, if it be a treaty, has not yet been ratified by the Senate, nor has the treaty concluding peace with Germany been ratified by the Senate. Any obligations imposed or sought to be imposed by the league or the treaty are not yet binding upon this Government. Therefore there is no legal authority from the league or the treaty to take action. If, therefore, it be of any authority whatever, it must relate back to the war powers of the President.

The war powers of the President are derived from the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring war against Germany. The war against Germany is not connected with the Dalmatian coast, nor with Italian boundaries, except as it may be connected with the treaty or with the league of nations. This action is not connected with the declaration of April 6, 1917. Neither the league nor the treaty, therefore, can be made the authority for this action, because they have not yet been ratified by the Senate. If it recur back, therefore, to the general war powers of the President, he possesses no war powers outside of the joint resolution to direct the Army and Navy against the enemy named in that joint resolution. That enemy is neither the Jugo-Slav nation nor the Italian nation. We are not at war with either one or the other of these nations—assuming that the Jugo-Slav nation shall become an independent State—nor are we authorized by the head of the Navy or any authority in the United States to invade Italy or Italian waters, nor to land upon the territory of the new proposed State of Jugo-Slavia.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I venture to suggest that my colleague is led into the same error as the Senator from Pennsylvania. He assumes that under "the new freedom" the Government is conducted under the Constitution, I suppose. Is that the assumption upon which the Senator is speaking?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am astonished that he has learned no better during the course of this long debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe the astonishment of my colleague is justified. We have so long been proceeding under the illimitable war powers of the Executive and under the functioning of a league that has not yet been ratified by the Senate that we have departed from the old lines of government. Sir Eric Drummond is functioning constantly. He is the secretary of the secretariat. The principal nation in the league, if it ever be accomplished, for our purposes is Great Britain. Great Britain, it seems from press reports, is delivering orders to the United States Navy in Italian waters. That is precisely what it is doing. Now, I have a very great respect for Great Britain, for her governmental powers and for what she has done in the world; but I refuse, for my part, to recognize any authority on her part since the Revolutionary War to order the American Navy anywhere in the world to perform any naval acts. The purpose of the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana is not only to ascertain by what authority this action is had, but, if possible, to check it. If this action accomplishes anything, it will place this Government and its armed forces in conflict either with the Italian Government or with a considerable part of the Italian forces.

Italy faces civil war to-day. This so-called poet leader who has occupied Fiume is not going merely to illustrate a stanza in some poem he has written. In addition to being a poet—not a common combination, it is true—he is a practical man in affairs in Italy, and he knows what he is doing. He has behind him a considerable portion of the public sentiment of the whole Italian nation. When this proceeds much further on the Dalmatian coast, in Fiume, or anywhere in the Adriatic Provinces, it is a very grave question whether the whole Italian people will not take charge of this matter. It is well understood that since Orlando's resignation, following a proclamation by the President over the heads of the Italian authorities——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I demand the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois is out of order. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to introduce a joint resolution. I send it to the Secretary's desk and ask that it be read. Instead of asking to have it lie over, I think I will ask that it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It covers not only the territory covered by the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, but covers future conduct elsewhere in the use of the Army and Navy, and declares it to be unlawful. I am getting back under the Constitution by this resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 111) outlining the attitude to be maintained by the Government of the United States and her naval and military forces in dealing with conditions upon the Dalmatian coast was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the interference by the Government of the United States in controversies concerning Italian boundaries, territory, or questions relating to the Adriatic Provinces, the action of the United States naval forces, under the orders of the supreme council, and any further action therein, be, and are hereby, disapproved and declared to be unwarranted and without lawful authority, and all such action in the premises is hereby declared not to be within the power, duty, or proper province of the Government of the United States of America, and all appropriations for military and naval purposes or in support thereof heretofore or hereafter made be, and the same are hereby, prohibited from being expended or in any manner used for any such matters relating to Italy. It further appearing from a statement by the Secretary of the Navy that on September 23, 1919, an American force from the United States Navy landed at Trau, a Dalmatian port, occupied the town and expelled or caused to withdraw therefrom Italian forces, recovered and occupied the place under a direction or assignment of such place in a zone alleged to be assigned by the supreme council to the United States to be policed by this Government; it is further declared that such assignment or direction by the supreme council of foreign territory to be policed or guarded by the United States Government is beyond the power of such council or the executive department of this Government so to impose such burdens or responsibilities on this Government, unless by treaty made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and that such attempt to anticipate the action of the Senate or otherwise impose any such obligation is unwarranted and declared to be of no binding force upon the United States.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 3104) authorizing the Central Pacific Railroad Co. of California, or its successors or assigns, to convey for public road or park purposes certain parts of its right of way; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:

A bill (S. 3105) for the relief of F. C. X. Boucher (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 3106) granting a pension to Mary Boyles (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 3107) granting a pension to Ada L. Kitchings; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3108) granting an increase of pension to Aurelia H. Gibson; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the investigation and development of methods of educational extension, Bureau of Education, intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

S. 276. An act to amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916;

S. 277. An act to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes;

S. J. Res. 95. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, blankets, and other camp equipment for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8078. An act to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the morning business is closed I ask permission to be allowed to read to the Senate a few excerpts sent me by Mr. Addison Brown, of Springfield, Mo., and stated by him to be from addresses made by Charles Sumner in 1845 and 1849, which I think might well apply to this question of a league of nations. I do not think that any of us will claim that Charles Sumner was a wild idealist, but rather that he was a practical, patriotic American; and with the permission of the Senate I would like to also read an extract or two from a letter inclosing the excepts from this speech of Charles Sumner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCUMBER. The letter is dated September 16, 1919, and is from Addison Brown, a lawyer of Springfield, Mo. In this letter he states:

Senator Sumner was one of the founders of the Republican Party. His speech on "The True Grandeur of Nations," made at Boston on July 4, 1845, was one of the best arguments in favor of a league of nations that I have ever read.

Following are a few excerpts from that speech as it is quoted to me by Mr. Brown:

THE TRUE GRANDEUR OF NATIONS.

"As the cedars of Lebanon are higher than the grass of the valley; as the heavens are higher than the earth; as man is higher than the beast of the fields; as angels are higher than man; as he that ruleth his spirit is higher than he that taketh a city; so are the virtues and victories of peace higher than the virtues and victories of war.

"In this spirit I propose to inquire what, in our age, are the true subjects of national ambition—what is truly national glory, national honor; what is the true grandeur of nations?

"The true grandeur of humanity is in moral elevation sustained, enlightened, and decorated by the intellect of man.

"The true token of this grandeur in a State are the diffusion of the greatest happiness among the greatest number, and the passionless, Godlike justice, which controls the relations of the State to other States, and to all the people who are committed to its charge.

"Let the grandeur of man be discerned in the blessings which he has secured; in the good he has accomplished; in the triumphs of benevolence and justice; in the establishment of perpetual peace.

"Believe that you can do it and you can do it."

THE WAR SYSTEM OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF NATIONS.

[Made before the American Peace Society at Boston, May 28, 1849.]

"I need not dwell now on the waste and cruelty of war. These stare us wildly in the face, like lurid meteor lights, as we travel the page of history. We see the desolation and death that pursue its demoniac footsteps. We look upon sacked towns, upon ravaged territories, upon violated homes; we behold all the sweet charities of life changed to wormwood and gall. Our soul is penetrated by the sharp moan of mothers, sisters, and daughters, of fathers, brothers, and sons, who, in the bitterness of their bereavement, refuse to be comforted. Our eyes rest at last upon one of these fair fields, where Nature, in her abundance, spreads her cloth of gold, specious and apt for the entertainment of mighty multitudes—or, perhaps, from the curious subtlety of its position, like the carpet in the Arabian tale, seeming to contract so as to be covered by a few only, or to dilate so as to receive an innumerable host. Here, under a bright sun, such as shone at Austerlitz or Buena Vista, amidst the peaceful harmonies of nature, on the Sabbath of peace, we behold bands of brothers, children of a common Father, heirs to a common happiness, struggling together in the deadly fight, with the madness of fallen spirits, seeking with murderous weapons the lives of brothers who have never injured them or their kindred. The havoc rages. The ground is soaked with their commingling blood. The air is rent by their commingling cries. Horse and rider are stretched together on the earth. More revolting than the mangled victims, than the gashed limbs, than the lifeless trunks, than the spattering brains, are the lawless passions which sweep, tempestlike, through the fiendish tumult.

"Horror-struck, we ask, Wherefore this hateful contest? The melancholy but truthful answer comes that this is the established method of determining justice between nations.

"The scene changes. Far away on the distant pathway of the ocean two ships approach each other, with white canvas broadly spread to receive the flying gales. They are proudly built. All of human art has been lavished in their graceful proportions, and in their well-compacted sides, while they look in their dimensions 'like floating happy islands on the sea. A numerous crew, with costly appliances of comfort, hives in their secure shelter. Surely these two travelers shall meet in joy and friendship; the flag at the masthead shall give the signal of friendship; the happy sailors shall cluster in the rigging, and even on the yardarms, to look each other in the face, while the exhilarating voices of both crews shall mingle in accents of gladness uncontrollable. It is not so. Not as brothers, not as friends, not as wayfarers of the common ocean, do they come together; but as enemies.'

"The gentle vessels now bristle fiercely with death-dealing instruments. On their spacious decks, aloft on all their masts, flashes the deadly musketry. From their sides spout cataracts of flame, amidst the pealing thunders of a fatal artillery. They, who had escaped 'the dreadful touch of merchant-marring rocks'—who had sped on their long and solitary way unharmed by wind or wave—whom the hurricane had spared—in whose favor storms and seas had intermitted their immitigable war—now at last fall by the hand of each other. The same spectacle of horror greets us from both ships. On their decks, reddened with blood, the murderers of St. Bartholomew and of the Sicilian Vespers, with the fires of Smithfield, seem to break forth anew, and to concentrate their rage. Each has now become a swimming Golgotha. At length, these vessels—such pageants of the sea—once so stately, so proudly built, but now rudely shattered by cannon balls, with shivered masts and ragged sails—exist only as unmanageable wrecks, weltering on the uncertain waves, whose temporary lull of peace is now their only safety. In amazement at this strange, unnatural contest, away from country and home, where there is no country or home to defend, we ask again, Wherefore this dismal duel? Again the melancholy but truthful answer promptly comes that this is the established method of determining justice between nations."

Mr. President, this accursed and damnable established method of determining peace and justice between the nations of the world has lasted altogether too long in the world. The time has come, the opportunity is ripe, for the American people, hand in hand with the people of the world, to disestablish this accursed established method of bringing about peace and justice in the world. We may not be taking the very best method. The proposed way may not be a perfect way, but any step in the right direction, any step intended to bring about some method of establishing peace and justice between the nations of the world, ought to be seized upon, the older method having so dismally and cruelly failed.

Mr. President, I think we all honor Charles Sumner. We honor him as one of the great founders of the Republican Party. We honor him as a great statesman, and his words that I have given to-day in these small excerpts speak a language of hope for the people not only of the United States, but of all the world. And again, Mr. President, I express the hope that we will be able to throw aside partisan prejudice, partisan fealty, and every sentiment of hatred toward the Executive because of any errors he may have made—and I think he has made many—and approach this subject as a nation desiring to establish justice and right between the peoples of the world.

Mr. President, for many years I have preached the doctrine of a league of nations to enforce peace, and though I think the instrument before us is far from perfect, I shall continue to stand by all my convictions, which have not been changed, that some arrangement can be entered into between the peace-loving great nations of the world to protect the rights of nations, just as communities protect the rights of their citizens.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], entertaining the views that he does on the horrors of war, so vigorously supporting an instrument—the covenant of the league of nations—which provides that the United States shall be involved in every war which arises in the world, under which an army of the United States will be organized to serve in Russia, under which an army of the United States is now being organized to serve in Germany, under which the spectacle which has been discussed here this morning of landing American military forces to take part in a local controversy on the shores of the Adriatic shall become part of the established system of our foreign relations.

I ask to have read a telegram from citizens of Spokane, Wash., which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., September 27, 1919.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.:

We believe that perpetuation of the political independence and sovereignty of the United States and the best interests of our allies and all liberty-loving peoples require adoption by the Senate of such of the amendments and reservations to the league of nations covenant proposed by the Foreign Relations Committee, together with such other amendments and reservations as may be necessary to make the peace treaty and league of nations covenant confirm the principles of the Declaration of Independence, Washington's Farewell Address, the Monroe doctrine, and the Constitution of the United States. Holding these convictions we hereby respectfully urge the Hon. WESLEY L. JONES and the Hon. MILES POINDEXTER to at all times exert, as United States Senators from the State of Washington, every legitimate power and influence which they possess for the adoption of the aforesaid amendments and reservations, to the end that "government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Unanimously authorized and adopted in open public meeting of the League to Preserve Americanism, of Spokane, Wash.

Edwin T. Coman, Del Carey Smith, B. L. Gordon, H. S. Stoolfire, R. P. Woodworth, O. C. Moore, A. G. Avery, C. H. Weeks, Thaddeus S. Lane, John M. Gleeson, A. T. Anderson, Julius A. Zittel, A. L. Lewelling, committee.

LABOR STRIKES.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senate might be interested in a voice from a soldier in one of the strike regions. I have a little clipping here from the Canton (Ohio) News, a newspaper published in my home city, relating to an incident which occurred at the plant of the United Alloy Steel Corporation, which is the largest of our many large manufacturing plants. It reads:

SOLDIER RUNS PICKET LINES.

Thursday afternoon at the plant of the United Alloy Steel Corporation a recently returned American soldier endeavored to enter the plant to work and was restrained and held back by a number of foreign strikers who were acting on the picket line.

To these foreigners the American soldier said: "I am an American and have just returned from France, where I was in active service for two years. I worked at this plant before enlisting, and while fighting in France for $30 a month you foreigners have held my job and earned big money. With your pockets full of money you can now afford to loaf. I have a wife and five children to support and must work. Time and again I went over the top and through the lines of Germans and other foreigners in France, and I am now going through this foreign picket line to work."

And he did.

There is much food for thought in that short statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I state to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that I received this morning photographs taken of some of this same kind of aliens who are chasing American citizens down the railroad track, throwing rocks and links and car pins at them. The men whom they are chasing are Americans who want to work. Those doing the chasing are the ones on strike, who are aliens, who have not even declared their intention of becoming American citizens. That is a constant occurrence, and in the Chicago Daily News and other Chicago newspapers snapshots that are taken by their correspondents on the ground are published every day. I am in receipt of those showing that that is the condition.

Mr. THOMAS. All of which, Mr. President, means, in my judgment, that it is time for Americans in this country to get together, whether they are native born or naturalized, because there are plenty of naturalized Americans who are just as good Americans as the native born. Once that movement begins, and I hope it will begin before night, the moral influence which such an aggregation would necessarily create in public opinion would do more to restore normal conditions in America than anything else I know of.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in connection with the matter to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] calls attention, I ask permission to read very briefly a few extracts from the principles which have been expressed in writing and printed in pamphlet form by the man who was designated by the American Federation of Labor to organize the steel workers—William Z. Foster, secretary of the American Federation of Labor committee appointed for that purpose, and the principal promoter and inciter of the strike.

A few days ago I was in Youngstown, Ohio. I was told there by responsible people that among the arguments which were used to induce the men to go on strike at meetings which were called for the purpose of bringing it about were statements like this: "If we see smoke coming out of the chimneys of this factory Monday morning we will be there and we will burn your houses down." Some of the people then said, "If we do go on strike, what will we live on?" "Oh," the organizers of the strike said, "there is plenty of food in the grocery stores down town and in the warehouses. Go and take it. It belongs to you anyhow."

It has been said by some people that the principles expressed in the pamphlet which is published under the name of "Syndicalism," by Earl C. Ford and William Z. Foster, have been abandoned by Foster, but from the incident which I have just cited it appears that the identical principles expressed in the book, so far from having been abandoned, are being put into effect among the inducements used by this man in bringing about the strike at the present time. They have not been abandoned at all. The same identical language which I have cited as being reported to me as the threats which were used and the advice which was given to employees of the steel mills to induce them to go on strike is contained in the pamphlet published over the name of their strike leader.

I want to read just a few short extracts to give an idea of the nature of the book. On page 5 of the book is contained this statement, under the title "Anti-Statism." A great many new words are manufactured to fit the new doctrines that are being put forth. I read:

Anti-Statism: At this early date, though many of the minor details of the organization plan of the new society can only be guessed at, many of its larger outlines are fairly clear. One of these is that there will be no State. The Syndicalist sees in the State only an instrument of oppression and a bungling administrator of industry, and proposes to exclude it from the future society. He sees no need for any general supervising governmental body, and intends that the workers in each industry shall manage the affairs of their particular industry; the miners shall manage the mines, the railroaders manage the railroads, and so on through all the lines of human activity.

Before reading a few more extracts from other pages of the book I pause to say that in the testimony given before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate within the last few days by prominent leaders of organized labor, including the president of the American Federation of Labor and including the reputed author of the Plumb plan for the disposition of the railroads, the essence and the fundamental principle involved in the extract from the book which I have just read appears. Boiled down, it amounted to this in that testimony, that they would not be satisfied with any action of a governmental body in the adjustment of such questions as wages and hours of labor and other industrial disputes. It appeared from that testimony that they would not be satisfied with its adjustment by any tribunal except their own tribunal.

In discussing the antistrike provision of the Cummins bill, which is pending before the Senate, the statement was made by one of them that if they are not satisfied with the conditions of wages and of labor that obtain in railroad employment, the workers ought to have the authority to cease to operate the lines. That means, of course, the assumption of governmental authority. I mention it for the purpose of showing that the extreme radical views of Foster, as expressed in this book called "Syndicalism," are in their essence and substance adopted by the authorized spokesmen and representatives who are, at present, at least, in control or appear to be in control of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated and allied organizations. On page 8 of this book appears this statement:

Selection of foremen, superintendents, etc.—In the future syndicalist society the ordinarily unscientific custom of majority rule will be just about eliminated. It will be superseded by the rule of facts and figures. Not only will the industries be operated in the undemocratic manner above outlined, but the responsible positions in them will be filled in a manner all at variance with democratic principles. The foremen, superintendents, etc., will be chosen on the score of their fitness by examination, instead of on the score of their ability to secure the support of an ignorant majority, through their oratorical powers, good looks, influence, or what not, as is the ordinary democratic procedure. Syndicalism and democracy based on suffrage do not mix.

On page 11 I find this:

The strikers or revolutionists—

They use the two words as synonyms—will be everywhere, and will everywhere seize or disable whatever capitalist property they can lay their hands on.

Further on, on the same page, I find this:

These individuals—

Referring to the police and officers of the law—

can be easily overwhelmed and disarmed.

Further on, on the same page, this occurs:

On the other hand, they are teaching working-class soldiers not to shoot their brothers and sisters—

"They," referring to the strikers—"syndicalists," as they are denominated—not to shoot their brothers and sisters who are in the revolt; but, if need be, to shoot their own officers and to desert the Army when the crucial moment arrives. This double propaganda of contempt for capitalist property "rights" and antimilitarism are inseparable from the propagation of the general strike.

That is the identical proposition to which I referred in the opening of my remarks.

On page 12 I find:

Starvation—The general strike will not be broken by the strikers being starved into submission, as is often objected. The general strike will be so devastating in its effects that it can last only a few days, during which period, if need be, the workers, accustomed as they are to starvation, and sustained by the enthusiasm of the revolution, could live on the most meager rations.

Mark this:

To get these rations the syndicalists intend to confiscate, as far as possible, all provisions found in the cities. They will also encourage the numerous poor farmers, tenants, and agricultural wageworkers to cast their fortunes with them, to revolt against the State, their landlords and employers, and to seize the land they occupy. Until production is normally resumed, the syndicalist will trade to these farmers the amassed wealth of the cities for their foodstuffs.

Further on, on the same page, referring to the syndicalist, I find:

They are making strike breaking such a dangerous profession that scabs are becoming pleasingly scarce and expensive. They literally hunt scabs as they would wild animals. This war on scabs is popularly known as "La chasse aux renards." (The fox chase.)

On page 15, under the head of "Sabotage," in giving their definition of sabotage, I find this:

Perhaps the most widely practiced form of sabotage is the restriction by the workers of their output. Disgruntled workers all over the world instinctively and continually practice this form of sabotage, which is often referred to as "soldiering." The English labor unions, by the establishment of maximum outputs for their members, are widely and successfully practicing it. It is a fruitful source of their strength.

The most widely known form of sabotage is that known as "putting the machinery on strike." The syndicalist goes on strike to tie up industry. If his striking fails to do this, if strike breakers are secured to take his place, he accomplishes his purpose by "putting the machinery on strike" through temporarily disabling it. If he is a railroader, he cuts wires, puts cement in switches, signals, etc., runs locomotives into turntable pits, and tries in every possible way to temporarily disorganize the delicately adjusted railroad system. If he is a machinist or factory worker and hasn't ready access to the machinery, he will hire out as a scab and surreptitiously put emery dust in the bearings of the machinery or otherwise disable it. Oftentimes he takes time by the forelock, and when going on strike "puts the machinery on strike" with him by hiding, stealing, or destroying some small indispensable machine part which is difficult to replace. As is the case with all direct-action tactics, even conservative workers when on strike naturally practice this form of sabotage—though in a desultory and unorganized manner. This is seen in their common attacks on machines, such as street cars, automobiles, wagons, etc., manned by scabs.

I presume they would call a soldier returned from France who wanted to work to keep his family from starving a "scab" and practice on him the methods which they describe here.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from what he is reading?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am reading from a book published by Earl C. Ford and William Z. Foster, entitled "Syndicalism."

Mr. THOMAS. They have another name for scabs; they call them "vermin."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I think they use that word in different parts of this book. I am only reading brief extracts from it. I think they call them that, and a good deal in addition.

Another kind of sabotage widely practiced by syndicalists is the tactics of either ruining or turning out inferior products.

This is quite familiar in the vineyards and orchards of the Pacific slope, where in packing fruit they stick their finger nails into it so that it spoils or drive with the thumb a copper tack into a grape vine so that it becomes diseased and very soon perishes—

Thus, by causing their employers financial losses they force them to grant their demands. The numerous varieties of this kind of sabotage are known by various terms, such as "passive resistance," "obstructionism," "pearled strike," "strike of the crossed arms," etc.

The French railroad strike of 1910 offers a fine example of this type of sabotage. The strike was lost and 3,300 men were discharged because of it. As a protest against this wholesale discharge an extensive campaign of passive resistance on the railroads was started.

I may interpolate here that often during the war I thought in connection with some of the remarkable apparent blunders made in transportation that something of this kind was operating upon the transportation system of the United States in the crucial hour of our national need.

The workers worked, but only for the purpose of confusing the railroad system. In the freight sheds shipments of glass were laid flat and heavy boxes piled upon them; "this side up with care" shipments were turned wrong side up; fragile and valuable articles were "accidentally" broken; perishable goods were buried and "lost," or ruined by being placed close to other shipments, such as oils and acids, that spoiled them. Also, a complete confusion was caused by the deliberate mixture and missending of shipments. On the roads engines broke down or "died" unaccountably; wires were cut; engines "accidentally" dumped into turntable pits; passenger train schedules were given up, trains arriving and departing haphazard. But the worst confusion came from the missending of cars. Thousands of cars were hauled all over France in a haphazard manner. For instance, the billing of a car of perishable goods intended for the north of France would be so manipulated that the car would be sent to the south of France and probably "lost." At a place just outside of Paris there were at one time 1,800 of such "lost" cars, many of them loaded with perishable freight consigned to no one knew whom. The most ridiculous "accidents" and "mistakes" continually occurred—for this the humorous form of sabotage. To cite a typical instance: Army officials in one town received notice of the arrival of a carload of dynamite for them. They sent a large detachment of soldiers to convoy it through town. On arrival at its destination the supposed carload of dynamite turned out to be a "lost" shipment of potatoes.

On page 17 it is stated:

"Badigeonage" (literally, stone colorage) is another variety of sabotage that has been effectively used. The barbers of Paris forced their employers to grant them their demands by throwing eggs filled with acid against the painted fronts of the barber shops, which after such treatment had to be repainted. Of the 2,300 barber shops in Paris, 2,000 were subjected to this treatment from 1902 to 1906, while the "badigeonage" campaign lasted.

"La bouche ouverte" (the open mouth) is another type of sabotage often used. By "la bouche ouverte" workers financially hurt their employers by telling the latter's customers of the deceptions practiced upon them. Building-trades workers tell building inspectors and architects of poor material used and cause it to be condemned and the work to be done over again; striking waiters expose the filthiness of the restaurants, etc.

Workers engaged in selling their masters' wares directly to the public have effective, even though unnamed, methods of sabotage. The waiter gives extra large portions of food to his customers and undercharges them for it. The drug clerk gives generously of pure drugs instead of adulterated ones, as he is supposed to. The grocer's clerk forgets to charge for all the articles he has sold, etc.

The various kinds of sabotage are applied singly or collectively, just as circumstances dictate. Some kinds can be used in one industry that can not be used in another. There are but few industries, however, that can not be saboted in one way or another.

Another term is "Neo-Malthusianism."

The syndicalist is a "race suicider." He knows that children are a detriment to him in his daily struggles, and that by rearing them he is at once tieing a millstone about his neck and furnishing a new supply of slaves to capitalism. He therefore refuses to commit this double error and carries on an extensive campaign to limit births among workers. He has been a powerful factor in reducing births in France, which, according to recent statistics, are annually 35,000 less than the deaths. He is turned from his course neither by the inspired warnings of physicians nor the paid appeals of patriots. He has no race pride and but little fear. He sees in "race suicide" an effective method of fighting his masters; therefore he uses it. * * *

The syndicalist is as "unscrupulous" in his choice of weapons to fight his everyday battles as for his final struggle with capitalism. He allows no considerations of legality, religion, patriotism, honor, duty, etc., to stand in the way of his adoption of effective tactics.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I not ask the Senator if he will not offer the entire pamphlet and have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where it will be accessible to the public? The more information we have on such a subject, I think, the better. I should be very glad if the Senator would do that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want to call attention particularly to two or three other brief paragraphs, and then I will consider the suggestion of the Senator. I am much obliged to him for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I particularly wish to make the request in view of the fact that the 700 or more policemen in the city of Washington have organized a local union, to which I have no objection as a local union, but they are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, in which Mr. Foster and his associates are now found actively engaged in this work. The police in the city of Washington are associated with and have received a charter from the American Federation of Labor, which they now have. They are now—and I particularly wish that document to go to the public as an entirety—affiliated with a labor union, and an outside one at that, in which these doctrines are avowed and taught by the active leader of the strike. It puts the guardians of the public peace in Washington in very bad association.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the fundamental objection to what the Senator has just mentioned—the affiliation of the police with a labor organization—is that it puts a function of the Government under the control of a private organization; and I am perfectly frank to say, as the deliberate conclusion I have formed from hearing the testimony of these men, that their policy and principle is to accomplish that very object—that governmental functions shall be under their control. There is a good deal of talk about the difference between conservative labor leaders and radical labor leaders, and there is some difference; but a good many of the labor leaders who are advertised as being conservative advocate what in effect would amount to the extreme result that is aimed at by Lenin and Trotski, namely, the dictatorship of the proletariat. If you put your police force, and actions of most vital concern to it and to the municipality which it serves, under the control of a labor union, you have the immediate result of the proposition that they make. You have, in so far as that function or agency of government goes, the dictatorship of the proletariat, and I fail to see anything particularly conservative about it.

On page 29 of this book I want to read these extracts in order to call attention to that particular part of it apart and separate from the general text:

The syndicalist is a radical antipatriot. He is a true internationalist, knowing no country. He opposes patriotism because it creates feelings of nationalism among the workers of the various countries and prevents cooperation between them, and also because of the militarism it inevitably breeds. He views all forms of militarism with a deadly hatred, because he knows from bitter experience that the chief function of modern armies is to break strikes, and that wars of any kind are fatal to the labor movement. He depends solely on his labor unions for protection from foreign and domestic foes alike and proposes to put an end to war between the nations by having the workers in the belligerent countries go on a general strike and thus make it impossible to conduct wars.

On page 30 there is a definition:

The anarchist is an individualist. He is an antidemocrat, having a supreme contempt for majority rule. He opposes authoritarianism in all its manifestations. He is an inveterate enemy of the State and its laws and would establish a society in which they will not exist. In his tactics he is a direct actionist.

In that definition the anarchist is identical with the syndicalist, according to the definition of the syndicalist contained in this book; but there seems to be a rather superrefined distinction drawn by the writer between the anarchist and the syndicalist.

Under the head "The antagonism between anarchism and syndicalism," he says:

Syndicalism, besides its continual warfare with socialism, which has already been sufficiently explained and described, has also an important point of quarrel with anarchism. Though both movements are at one in the matters of principle, ideals, etc., there is much friction between them. The cause for this is not hard to find.

The anarchist movement proper is an educational one. It says in effect: "The misery of society is due to its ignorance. Remove this ignorance and you abolish the misery." Consequently it places strong emphasis on its attempt to found the modern school; its educational campaigns against the State, church, marriage, sex slavery, etc. Anarchism is striving for an intellectual revolution."

Further on he continues:

The syndicalist accepts on principle the anarchist positions on the modern school, neo-Malthusianism, marriage, individualism, religion, art, the drama, literature, etc., that go to make up the intellectual revolution.

I may pause here to say that syndicalism, as defined in this book, announces as one of its fundamental principles the adoption and use for the accomplishment of the revolution which they have in view of the agency of labor unions; and it is quite significant that the labor unions have selected the author of this book, the exponent of syndicalism, who proposes to carry out his revolution through their agency, to represent them in organizing the steel strike. Needless to say these views do not represent the great mass of labor in this country, either in or out of the unions.

On page 32 he says:

Syndicalists, on the contrary, are strictly possibilists; they have emerged from impossibilism, and wherever their movement normally develops they revolutionize the old unions rather than build new ones.

On page 35 he says:

A reaction soon took place against this devitalization of the unions, and to the cry of "no politics in the unions" they were placed on a basis of neutrality toward political action. This neutrality soon developed into open hostility, when the designs of the politicians to subjugate the unions became unmistakably evident. The anarchists, whose movement was stronger in France than in any other country in the world, perceived this antipolitical tendency in the unions, and considering them a fertile field for their propaganda during the nineties made their celebrated "raid" upon them. This event, which Sorel says is one of the most important in modern history, may be said to mark the birth of syndicalist movement proper.

"The raid upon the unions" by the anarchists, to which he refers there, was the capturing of the unions by the anarchists through joining the unions and getting control of them; and that is the purpose of the syndicalists in this country, as he says, to revolutionize the old unions rather than to form new ones, and the "direct action," in its broadest sense, which is so often referred to here, has for its purpose in the settlement of industrial questions arising between employers and employees the elimination of the State. As said in the beginning of this book, they advocate the abolishment of the State and all governmental institutions. In other words, they propose that the employee in the settlement of all industrial disputes shall act not through the Government indirectly upon the employer but directly upon the employer eliminating the Government altogether. That, in its broadest sense, is direct action, and of course it means arbitrary action; and, as set forth here, it means the use of sabotage and violence and murder.

On page 36:

"A fair day's pay for a fair day's work." This formula expresses the vague ideal for which the majority of American labor unions are striving. Such unions grant the right to their masters to exploit them, only asking in return that they be given a "fair" standard of living. It is a slave ideal. The eradication, through education, of the ignorant conservatism from whence this slave ideal springs is a most important step to be taken in the placing of the American labor movement upon an effective basis. The workers must learn that they are the producers of all wealth, and that they alone are entitled to enjoy it. Inspired by this knowledge, they will refuse to recognize the claim of their masters to even the smallest fraction of this wealth. They will then have a keen sense of their wrongs and a bitter hatred for capitalism, instead of their present indifference. They will then war in earnest upon their masters and will never rest content until, by the abolition of the wage system, they will have forced them to disgorge their ill-gotten booty.

From that it becomes quite evident how perfectly futile and hopeless it would be to attempt to meet the demands of the striker by any adjustment of wages or hours of labor. The uncompromising demands which their leader sets forth as the goal of all their methods and of strikes is to take over altogether the property of the country and abolish altogether the wage system and become themselves the owners of the wealth of the land, assuming, of course, that they are the heirs and joint heirs of the accumulated productions of the labors of ten thousand generations of men now buried and forgotten.

On the same page he says:

The workers will have to learn the self-evident fact that in almost every respect the interests of the workers and their employers are diametrically opposite and unharmonizable; that the workers produce just so much, and that it is to their interest to retain as much of this product as they can through higher wages, shorter hours, better working conditions, etc., whereas it is to the interest of their employers to rob them of as much of this product as possible through low wages, long hours, wretched working conditions, etc.,

On page 40, under the titie "Legality," he says:

The campaign for "law and order" tactics that is continually carried on in the unions by various kinds of legalitarians and weaklings exerts a bad influence upon them. It must cease. The workers must be taught to use all kinds of successful tactics, whether these have been sanctioned by the ruling class or not.

What appears on page 41, under the head of "Sick and death benefits," is quite interesting, because it is similar to the position on the same subject that was taken by some of the so-called conservative leaders in their testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the Senate, who appeared opposing provisions in the pending railroad bill for the taking of a certain portion of the excess earnings of railroads for profit sharing by the employees, for the improvement of working conditions, and similar purposes, all of which was opposed by them, I suppose, on the principle that the adoption of those practices would weaken the influence of the labor unions. If the employers cared for the workers in that way it would tend to make the workers contented and would destroy the influence of the unions. The unions themselves take the position that they alone should have the control of all bonuses and benefits and relief work among the employees.

Mr. SHERMAN. In that connection, Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment before he passes to another paragraph?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. One of the prominent officials of the American Federation of Labor extended that doctrine to lengths that would interest police forces, national guards, sheriffs' forces, State constabularies, and the Regular Army. He said that if Congress prohibited strikes in public utilities, like steam railways, he would pay no attention to the law whatever, and would advise the members of the unions affiliated with his federation to disregard any such law. How would that agree with the doctrine set forth in the pamphlet from which the Senator is reading? Is there any distinguishing difference between one kind of lawlessness and another?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It agrees exactly with it. I can not see that there is any fundamental difference, because both, in so far as the questions which have been referred to go—and those are as important as any questions in which the Government is interested—deny the authority of the Government and boldly take the position that no governmental tribunal may interfere with the disposition of these questions by the labor unions, which means, of course, by the leaders of the labor unions, a dictatorship of a handful of what Mr. Foster in this book calls "the militant minority."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have in my possession the constitution and statutes of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in the United States and Canada. When the Senator speaks of dictators, there are certain rules applying both to the United States and Canada which absolutely prohibit the membership of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers from differing from the heads of the organization, a little coterie of men. If they differ from them, or criticize them, or present to any legislative body any criticism of their conduct, they are to be suspended or expelled from the brotherhood, and the charter of the division is to be revoked if the division commits itself to anything contrary to these heads—Mr. Stone and others—who come here and represent that they vote a million nine hundred thousand railway men.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly. On page 41, under the head of "Sick and death benefits," he says:

The beneficial institutions with which American labor unions are loaded unquestionably very seriously lessen the fighting abilities of these unions. They prostitute the unions from their true functions as aggressive organizations to the false ones of defensive organizations. They do this by causing great sums of money to be piled up in the hands of national committees, who, of course, have full power to protect these funds. These committees, wishing to prevent their funds from being jeopardized by strikes, ordinarily use this power to prevent strikes and to direct the minds of the workers into insurance channels. Such funds are fruitful sources of harmful centralization. Rebels all over the world are unanimous in their condemnation.

Strike benefits: Large strike benefits are doubly detrimental to the labor movement. On the one hand, like sick and death benefits, they cause centralization and weaken the action of the unions by placing large funds in the hands of powerful national committees, who keep these funds intact by preventing strikes; and, on the other hand, they cause the workers to depend for success upon their niggardly savings—which are utterly eclipsed by the immense funds of the capitalists—instead of upon their economic power, which is invincible.

On page 45 he says:

According to a statement made recently by Vincent St. John, at present secretary-treasurer of the I. W. W., the W. F. of M., when it was in its best fighting days, several years ago, was dominated and controlled by a fighting minority of about 10 per cent of its membership. This militant minority was so well organized and effective, however, that it compelled the whole W. F. of M. to be a fighting organization. It was a living proof of the power of the militant minority.

I submit those extracts, Mr. President, from many others which might be read from this work, for the purpose of presenting to anyone who is interested in the subject the purpose and object of the strike that is now in existence in the steel industry.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, can the Senator say when this pamphlet was published? I have examined it, I may say, and I do not find any date of publication upon it, but I ask the question because it was stated before the Senate committee that this was published in 1911, and that since that date Foster had been born again. If he has been born again, or has seen a new light, it must have been a brighter light than St. Paul saw on the road to Damascus. But whatever the date of the publication may be, there is inherent evidence in this pamphlet that it was printed later than 1911, because on page 14 the Senator will observe that the author referred to a work, La Vie Ouvriere, printed April 20, 1912; and on page 28 he refers again to another work which was printed at Geneva May 25, 1912.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it was not my purpose this morning to discuss this question, but simply to present these extracts of formal statements of the principles of the strike leaders. But there is a great deal of extraneous evidence that in the conduct of this strike at the present time the same identical doctrines which are elucidated in this volume are being advocated and put into effect, in so far as they are able to do it.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, in open executive session, resumed consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the 1st day of May, 1919, may sometime come to be regarded as the beginning of an epoch in American history. It will be recalled that upon that day there were from 22 to 25 deadly explosives in the mails on their way to men either in public life or prominent in industrial life. The manner in which these deadly explosives were mailed and the concert of action which was manifestly behind the movement seem to disclose that there was somewhere in our country an organized force prepared to accomplish its ends through riot, disorder, and bloodshed. I doubt if darkest Russia ever presented a more remarkable condition at one specific time than that which was presented in our country upon the 1st and 2d days of May, 1919.

It will be recalled also that in many of the large cities of the United States there were riots and disorder on these days, to such an extent that it seemed that these also were directed from some central authority. If one will recur to the press dispatches of the 1st and 2d of May, he will read of scenes which will remind him of the stories of Victor Hugo and the barricade fights in Paris. Our cities took on a wholly foreign aspect—things strange, unusual, and un-American were happening everywhere.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I inquire of the Senator from Idaho if his speech has anything to do with the league of nations or the treaty with Germany?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will be patient, I hope to connect it with the subject—it has much to do with it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Everything?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it has relation to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear that; but the Senator is starting a little far off. He might as well start with the flood to prove how much has been lost in the Mississippi Valley by the floods there.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Mississippi is indulging in his irrelevant remarks, which only disturb me in the sense that they occupy my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They were not irrelevant. They were relevant and to the point as to whether the Senator is relevant or not.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Mississippi is through, I will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I am through. I was waiting to see whether the Senator is through.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not through. I have not even begun.

The matter which I have in mind is one which, to my way of viewing things, is quite relevant to the general situation which is presented to us to-day. While I should hardly hope to be able to convince the Senator from Mississippi that anything I shall say or that anyone else should say in opposition to the league of nations is relevant to the discussion, I may be permitted under the rules of the Senate, nevertheless, to proceed, I presume, in my own way.

Not only, Mr. President, were these disturbances characteristic of the early days of the month of May, but if we examine the succeeding current events we find that they were but the beginning of what was evidently a movement in this country which could only have its foundation in the belief that truly American principles no longer obtain with reference to the settlement of industrial or social conditions.

If we follow this particular occasion down to the 3d of June, we find another general movement throughout the country very similar, indeed, to the one which took place upon the 1st and 2d of May, in which there seems to have been a renewed effort upon the part of some one to start a general disturbance and effectuate lawlessness throughout the entire country. It was upon the 3d of June that an effort was made to destroy the home, doubtless intending to destroy the life, of the Attorney General of the United States, and undoubtedly all that saved the home from destruction, and perhaps the lives of those who were within, was a probable accident to the party upon his deadly mission.

Upon the same day the home of the mayor of the city of Cleveland was dynamited. Upon the same day the home of Representative Powers, of Massachusetts, was wrecked by a bomb. Upon the same day the residence of Justice Hayden, of the Boston municipal court, was destroyed by a deadly explosive.

In Philadelphia, upon the same day, attempts were made to blow up a Catholic Church and a private residence in West Philadelphia; in Paterson, N. J., the house of Max Gold, the silk manufacturer, was wrecked and destroyed by a bomb; in New York, upon the same day, several persons were killed through the explosion of a bomb at the home of Judge Charles Nott, jr.; at Pittsburgh a bomb explosion placed upon the porch of Mr. C. J. Cassidy destroyed the building. Another explosion took place at the residence of United States Judge W. H. Thompson in another part of the city. Throughout a wide stretch of country there was again evidence of this general movement, a determination, apparently, to intimidate those in authority or to destroy, as a matter of warning, those who were representatives of the law or were in a position where they were supposed to be executors of the law. A proclamation was issued about this time from which I read a paragraph or two as follows:

> The time has come when the social question solution can be delayed no longer. Class war is on and can not cease, but with a complete victory for the international proletariat. We are not many, perhaps, but more, perhaps, than you dream of; but few, we are determined to fight to the last, till no man remains in opposition to our system. There will have to be bloodshed. We will not dodge it. There will have to be murder. We will kill because we think it necessary. There will have to be destruction. We will destroy to rid the world of your tyrannical institutions. We are ready to do anything and everything to suppress the capitalist class, just as you are doing anything and everything to suppress the proletariat revolution.

Mr. President, these methods and doctrines are wholly foreign to the American system of settling difficulties, and wholly at war with all our conceptions of national life. They are importations from foreign countries and foreign climes. They have no possible place in our system of civilization. They can not continue and our Government survive. The breath of life of this Republic is order and law.

Without assuming to pass upon the question of the righteousness of the contention of anyone who may be dissatisfied with his lot in the industrial or social world, his rights can not be made secure through violence. We have many evils to remedy, but they can be remedied in an orderly and legal fashion and in time will be so remedied. In this country if citizens will meet the obligations of citizenship there is no wrong but must yield to the force of public opinion.

Following these disturbances which might by some be considered individual, as there is no evidence at hand or perhaps no definite proof of the combination which may be behind them, there came the race riots which menaced a number of the more thickly settled communities in different States in the Union. They broke out here in the city of Washington, in Chicago, in one or two of the southern cities, and came to be almost chronic for a period of several weeks. We have had in times past some of that class of disturbances, but they have never heretofore reached the magnitude and extent which characterized them some 30 and 60 days ago.

These are another evidence of a spirit of serious unrest underlying the entire situation with which we as a people now have to deal. They can not be considered as mere individual instances or spasms of discontent. They indicate a deep and underlying feeling upon the part of a vast class of the American people that the way to settle difficulties now is not through the orderly processes of the law, but by taking the law into their own hands; in other words, a lack of appreciation of the American system and an utter breakdown of the belief which has heretofore obtained almost universally among our people that no evil was too great and no wrong too strongly entrenched to yield to the orderly processes of the law.

If I may refer to further evidence of this lawlessness I call attention to some of the lynchings which have taken place within the last 60 days, not confined to any particular section of the country, but extending over wide reaches of country, covering every section of the United States, and demonstrating beyond question that the blood lust which has characterized certain incidents and conditions claimed to be local heretofore has taken on a wider reach and a wider jurisdiction.

I read a paragraph from a paper under date of August 31. It is not necessary to give the locality, because it would throw no light upon the subject. It says:

The attack was Saturday night. He and six other negro men were caught in the negro quarter after the dogs led the authorities to the house. McCarthy was later identified as the assailant. Before the officers could get the negro to jail a mob overpowered them and shot the prisoner to death. The body was then tied behind the automobile, and the procession on Sunday began with the dead man dragging behind in the dirt. The body was then taken in front of the home and on a burning pile of pine fagots was consumed. Before the sheriff could arrive on the scene most of the body had been burned.

He had been a soldier, as I recall, in this war.

Another incident is described in the following language:

The negro was seated on the ground and a buggy axle driven into the ground between his legs; his feet were chained together with locked chains, and he was tied with wire. A fire was built. Pokers and flatirons were procured and heated in the fire. It was 30 minutes before they were red hot. His self-appointed executors burned his eyeballs with red-hot irons, and when he opened his mouth to cry for mercy a red-hot poker was rammed down his throat. Red-hot irons were placed on his feet, back, and body until a hideous stench of burning human flesh filled the Sabbath air.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from an address by Judge Moorefield Story.

Last night in Omaha, Nebr., there occurred another one of these fearful lynchings in perhaps as orderly a community as we find anywhere in the country. I quote from a morning paper as follows:

OMAHA, NEBR., September 28.

A lynching, which developed many characteristics of a race riot, held this city terrorized for nine hours to-day.

Mayor Edward P. Smith was himself saved from lynching by a policeman, who, it was reported, cut the rope from about the mayor's neck while his comrades clubbed off the mob. At midnight it was said that the mayor was unconscious in a hospital.

The riot centered about the new county courthouse building, which was set on fire in the efforts to reach William Brown.

* * * * * * *

With the flames mounting steadily from floor to floor, Sheriff Mike Clark and his deputies fought a grim battle of hours to save Brown.

* * * * * * *

Mayor Smith to-night was said to be in a critical condition at a hospital, although his physician declined to say just how seriously he is injured. A rope was thrown around his neck and he was pulled off the ground twice before two police officers succeeded in cutting the rope and getting him into an automobile and away from the mob.

The mayor had gone to the courthouse and held a consultation with Sheriff Clark. Emerging from the courthouse, he met the mob and began to make an appeal for law and order. Somebody shouted, "Lynch him," and a member of the mob threw a rope around his neck.

Several men dragged the mayor half a block and threw the loose end of the rope over a trolley pole. Twice they drew the mayor's body from the ground. Each time two police officers cut the rope. Following the second attempt, these officers succeeded in placing the mayor into a police motor car and rushed him to a surgeon's office near by. The mayor was bleeding from the mouth and nose, and after a brief examination by physicians was taken to a hospital. At the hospital it was stated by the physicians at midnight that he was still unconscious.

Mr. President, it is something of a humiliation for us to make the confession, but I doubt very much if in any of the great civilized countries of the world you will find such manifestations of lawlessness and utter disregard of established institutions as characterized the many incidents which have happened in this country since the 1st day of May, 1919. There has been one continuous saturnalia of lawlessness coming up from all phases and classes of society. It is not a mere surface indication; apparently it is a disease deep seated and well embedded in our industrial and social life. Lawlessness has come almost to be a national characteristic. I repeat that if not checked it means the utter breakdown of the republican system of government. People will not indefinitely support a government which does not afford protection and security. It is in every sense at war with everything which we have heretofore believed to be characteristic of the American system of government. It calls for the deepest consideration upon the part not only of legislators, who, in fact, can do but little in adjusting the situation, but upon the part of citizens everywhere. It is one of those diseases of society which society itself must throw off. Nothing can reach the trouble so effectively as an aroused public sentiment—a full consciousness of its menace and a determination that the menace shall cease. It calls for the cooperation, the sustained effort of each and every member of the community.

Everyone, even the most thoughtless, must realize there can be no such thing as a republican government, a democratic government, or self-government in any form without a deep and abiding respect and obedience for the established law of the land. If the time ever comes when our system of orderly and regulated government is to break down, the first man to suffer and the man who will go to the bottom first and suffer most will not be the man of position or influence but the average citizen throughout the country, the laborer in all walks of life. No one is so deeply concerned in maintaining respect for law and obedience to the law as the average citizen, the workman, the laborer throughout the country. He more than anyone else has a priceless heritage in established order and in regulated affairs; and the man who teaches lawlessness, the man who would inculcate disobedience to law, is not the friend of labor but unmistakably its enemy.

These matters would have no place in the consideration of this particular question before us if I did not feel that underlying this entire condition of discontent and lawlessness is a breakdown of faith in the worth and efficiency of our Government, an utter absence of true Americanism. I can not but believe that there has been fearful neglect somewhere, neglect to inculcate from day to day and year to year the value and lessons of orderly government and the unmistakable sacrifices which always and inevitably follow in the wake of violence and disorder. I feel, furthermore, that there has been something more than neglect; that those whose position and places of responsibility enjoin upon them to be teachers by precept and example, if not by words, have spread false doctrines and planted the seeds of faithlessness. The great body of the people have been hearing strange words and new doctrines indeed from the lips of leaders of late such as they never before heard from those in whose keeping for a brief season have been intrusted the responsibilities of Government and the direction of great affairs.

We turn now to an entirely different class, to those who represent an entirely different situation, and who, in my judgment, have even greater responsibilities for the maintenance of American institutions and the support of law than those to whom I have been referring. Dr. Murray Butler said a few nights ago in a speech, speaking of that class to whom I have been referring:

There should be no mistake about its program. It openly calls our Constitution dishonest. It denounces the fathers of our country as crooks, as men of mediocre intelligence, and as attorneys of the capitalist class. In the making and building of America the socialists can see nothing of idealism, nothing of sacrifice, nothing of high principles, nothing of love of liberty, nothing of aspiration for a finer and freer manhood. Let there be no mistake about the definiteness of the issue. America's existence is challenged to-day.

I agree with the distinguished educator that America's existence is challenged to-day, and the entire system, from top to bottom, under which we live; but I wholly disagree with his view that that challenge comes from one class of people alone. While there are those who are digging away with the pickax at the foundation of the American system, there are those in responsible places who are tearing away the rafters and the roofing, leaving the whole structure open to every storm that arises anywhere in the heavens. If there be anything peculiarly and distinctly characteristic of prominent men, both in civic and business affairs, it is their apparent desire to be original in tearing away some vital part of the American Republic. They seem to think that change is synonymous with reform.

A few nights ago Judge Gary in a public speech in New York stated to his listeners that the policies and principles of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson were out of fashion, and no longer should be the guide of the American people in the affairs of government.

What is there left to the American Republic in its vital and essential principles if the policies and the principles of Washington and Jefferson are out of fashion and no longer worthy of the support of the American people? If the statement of Mr. Gary had been written upon the outside of a red pamphlet, and circulated throughout this country by some man in the ordinary walks of life, he would have been challenged at once for sending out disloyal literature, and himself subject to prosecution under the espionage laws of the country. When the policies of Washington and Jefferson are set aside, when the principles upon which they built are repudiated and rejected, then the system as we have known it and as we have maintained it has been so effectually broken down that it is no longer the American Republic.

It may not be out of place to mention that just 30 days, 1 month, from the time that Mr. Gary announced, amid his cheering banqueters, that the policies of Washington and Jefferson were out of fashion, Mr. Foster, with his red pamphlet in his hand, appeared at the door of Mr. Gary's industries, and knocked rudely and long, and advised Mr. Gary that he accepted his proposition that the policies of Washington and Jefferson were out of fashion, and that he had another system to take the place of those policies of government.

You can not break down a part of the American system, essential and indispensable to its maintenance in its integrity as we have known it, and expect to hold unassailed the other portions which are also regarded as essential to its integrity. When men in responsible positions proclaim policies heretofore regarded as vital to our system, heretofore looked upon as almost sacred, they take great chances of destroying that devotion to our whole system, essential to orderly and stable government.

It may be said in justification of or in fairness to Judge Gary that he had in mind particularly the foreign policies of Washington and of Jefferson, although he did not so characterize them in his speech. But no part of our system was deemed more worthy of support by Washington and Jefferson than our foreign policy. They believed it indispensable to our whole scheme and plan of an independent people. Judge Gary, it would seem, should bear in mind also that millions of our people believe with an unfaltering belief that without this policy there can survive no American system. It is a part of our scheme of Americanism. It links itself up with our Constitution; it is ingrained in the moral fiber of our people. To denounce it and reject it is to spread consternation and even despair among millions as to the future of the American Republic.

Since the unfortunate trouble arose between the great steel companies and the employees I had sent to me a printed page containing among others this statement:

> We will either have an American country with American institutions or a Russian country with Russian institutions.

It was sent by one who was defending the position of the steel companies, or, in any event, condemning the employees. I am not about to pass judgment on the merits or demerits of that controversy. I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts. I hope to be later. But I submit to those who direct the affairs of that great industry this question: How are you going to have an American country with American institutions if you spread broadcast the false and disloyal teachings that the policies and principles of Washington and Jefferson are out of fashion and no longer a guide for the American people? Upon these principles American institutions were built; upon these principles they will be maintained, if maintained at all. Is there anything more vain, more utterly delusive than to suppose that you can have the American system for the people and some scheme of internationalism based upon military autocracy as is the league of nations for the leaders and rulers? On the other hand, if the leaders and rulers feel that the policies and principles upon which our institutions were based and built are no longer worthy of our support, shall they be surprised that others than themselves have plans of substitution?

Mr. President, there is an organization fairly well known in this country, called the League to Enforce Peace. It has been circularizing the country for the last nine months. It has sent out thousands of dollars worth of literature, and it has been my opportunity to examine a vast amount of it—as much as time would permit. I am perfectly aware that hundreds of people whose loyalty can not be questioned have joined that organization. I am glad to say, however, that many are leaving it more rapidly than a few months ago they joined it.

In all the literature which has been sent out by this organization I have yet to discover a patriotic paragraph, a single pamphlet truly and deeply American. No appeal for American institutions or American system of government, no effort to instill a deeper or more active interest in our own Government. The literature they are sending broadcast over the country is singularly free from all reference to the worth of American institutions or to the necessity of building up more strongly in the minds of the American people their love and affection for our system of government. They devote their time exclusively either to direct or to insidious attack upon our policies heretofore obtaining. Their literature, in my judgment, while far more subtle and more thoroughly protected, is just as dangerous and quite as well calculated to destroy American nationalism and a true sentiment of patriotism as the literature which has been more thoroughly condemned here upon the floor of the Senate. The policies under which we have come to our present prestige and power are either openly rejected or covertly assailed.

I am perfectly willing to concede that many of the distinguished and able men connected with this organization think they are serving the cause of humanity. But they seem to believe in order to render that service effectual they must bring about the rejection of the policies essential to the maintenance of American institutions. Doubtless they feel like Judge Gary and others, that these policies and principles have served their purposes and are now antiquated and out of date, but doubtless others may feel that the whole system has served its purpose and substitution must be had. Whatever they believe and whatever their purpose, the effect of their propaganda is to utterly disparage nationalism in its truest and noblest conception.

A few months ago Dr. Lowell and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] joined in debate upon the question of the league of nations. I quote a single paragraph from Dr. Lowell's address. It shows how subtly but naturally, and apparently with some degree of satisfaction, certain advocates of this league never permit an occasion to pass by without throwing some jeer at that which has been regarded by the American people as all but sacred.

Dr. Lowell says:

> One never gets very far in this argument without hearing from Washington's Farewell Address. Now, do not laugh at the Farewell Address. That Farewell Address was a famous document in its day.

And he added:

> So were the Ten Commandants.

"Now, do not laugh at Washington's Farewell Address!" Who would? Who do you suppose was about to break loose in uproarious laughter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, the Senator realizes that the attitude of those who support this treaty and the league of peace is that there is not the slightest ground for saying that American institutions are endangered at all, and if he looks over the country I am sure he will agree that we who support the league of nations have just as much right to claim to be supporters of American institutions as he has. What Dr. Lowell meant was that this proposed league of nations did not contemplate the abrogation of the Ten Commandments any more than it did contemplate the abrogation of reverence for Washington and his Farewell Address. He took the position that that was a mere attempt to misrepresent the real issue before the American people.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the interpretation of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is not a happy one. I digress long enough to say, however, that I am dealing now with the teachings and their effect of the supporters of the league. Whatever may be their motives, the effect of their teachings are in conflict with Americanism as it has been accepted heretofore. I say that there are a vast number of people who are supporting the league of nations who never let an opportunity go by of belittling and reflecting upon everything that is truly American; and Dr. Lowell is one of them. What was the object of cautioning his audience not to laugh at Washington's Farewell Address? Has it generally been considered a thing for laughter? Has it generally produced disorderly and frivolous conduct by American audiences? No; the sneer was in Dr. Lowell's mind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; in a few moments.

It is no surprise to one who has examined the books of this distinguished educator to read his comment on Washington's Farewell Address. It is in harmony with the cold indifference, the ill-concealed contempt for everything American found throughout his writings. Not even the guarded expressions of commendation so often found in the writings of other countries—certainly none of the enthusiasm for the great heroes of American history which may be found in almost any volume on the subject by foreign authors—are anywhere discoverable in the works of this native American with his alien tastes. Nothing in our institutions, nothing in our traditions, rich with the stories of sacrifice and replete with the tales of heroism of men and women who gave all for the Republic; nothing in the most marvelous achievement in the cause of liberty itself and self-government the world has ever known is able to draw from him a striking paragraph or an enthusiastic period. Imbued with foreign notions, moved by foreign ideals, he gives to the noble institutions under which he lives and the splendid fabric whose majestic simplicity as a citizen he daily enjoys only the "cold respect of a passing glance."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in that respect President Lowell is not at all different from President Wilson, who expressed the opinion that the Constitution of the United States was based upon a principle which could not succeed, and condemned Jefferson and Hamilton and spoke with the same sort of levity of the Declaration of Independence that President Lowell used with reference to Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. BORAH. I may come to that later.

"Now, do not laugh at Washington's Farewell Address." Contemptuous remark! No Boston-born audience needs any such suggestion. A single son may disgrace her soil, but the title deeds of American liberty and American honor are not jeered in Boston nor anywhere else except among and by traitors. High time the American people who have sons and daughters to educate take note of the fact that at the head of one of her most honored and ancient institutions of learning is one who holds in such contempt one of the noblest of American documents that when he departs from his written address, leaves for a time his stilted ambiguities to indulge in the antics of a humorist, he can find no subject so worthy of his jibe, so fit for his jest, as Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. President, in the old days, particularly in Rome and Venice, there were those who gained a livelihood by poisoning people. It was a profession. Through conscientious and persistent effort and under the stimulus of professional pride they raised their calling to the standard of a fine art. The profession, however, was divided into two classes, distinct in methods and widely separated by class feelings. There were those of culture and social standing, often members of some old and highly respected family. Then there were those coming up from the rough walks of life, crude and unlettered, without either social or political recognition. The one class accomplished their evil purposes through subtlety and secrecy, instilling infinitesimal doses of poison in the daily food, watching the victim's health break day by day and week by week, leered and watched and fed until at last, baffling all the skill of physicians, the crime was consummated. More open, bold, and brutal, the other class would thrust their poisoned stilettos into the marked individual as they jostled him upon the streets or met him under the shadow of night. Between the two classes there was nothing in common save that the achievement of both was that of murder.

Mr. President, you may destroy this Government, bring ruin and chaos to this sacred edifice, you may uproot its traditions and dry up the springs of national life just as effectually by putting out for the daily food of our youth contempt and derision, distrust, and falsehood concerning its history and its institutions as you can by the bomb and red flag—both accomplish the same thing, though achieved in different ways. The professional sappers and miners of national life, the destroyers of national power and glory may not recognize each other—the cultured professor may scorn the rioter and the revolutionist, but they are brothers in the same cause, linked together by a common result. History will finally associate them and the scorn of mankind will finally treat them as one. They will stand together at the bar of the future as the coconspirators against the peace and happiness of the American people and the destroyers and wreckers of the noblest institution for human happiness yet conceived by the wit of man.

Sir, it is reported that upon the 26th day of February, 1919, the Secretary of the Navy declared before the Press Club, in Washington, "The constitution of the league of nations will be remembered long after the Declaration of Independence and the United States Constitution are forgotten."

That is the thought, consciously or unconsciously, lying back in the minds of all those who are advocating a league of nations. They believe they are building something here vastly greater than our Government and in comparison with which our Government will ultimately pale into insignificance. Its most important events will be forgotten. Its individuality will be lost in the vaster conception, and we will all become one happy family—American, Japanese, Chinaman, and Hottentot—forever at peace with each other and living in delightful association. The destiny of the Republic is measured—national sentiment, national pride, "my own, my native land," all such things, together with our proudest achievements are to be merged into internationalism. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution will be forgotten. The American Revolution will be treated as a mistake. The Secretary is logical and sincere.

It is reported in a speech delivered, I believe, in Kansas City the President declared that the league of nations was greater than the United States Senate, greater than the American Republic. To me this is an astounding statement. Speaking, I trust, in proper respect, it revealed to me more fully than ever before the whole purpose of this, as I view it, perfectly disloyal scheme. I can see it in no other light. I must in such matters speak the truth as I see it.

All these doings and sayings which I have recalled, all this striking in different ways—some by lawless acts, some by sinister suggestions, some by bolder teachings—at the American Republic can in the end have but one effect, and that is to undermine the people's faith in our institutions and drive from their hearts that love of country without which no form of government was ever strong enough to long hold together a people.

Mr. President, having eyes to see let us see and having ears to hear let us hear the things that daily transpire about us—America is no longer the America we have known and loved. Why not admit it and set about to redeem it. Things foreign to her whole nature, things at war with all her plans and purposes, things which challenge her entire intellectual and moral being have found recognition here. In such a crisis each must decide for himself how he can best serve the people whose lot has been cast with our institutions and whose emblem of hope is still the Stars and Stripes. For myself I propose to strive in whatever way I can to see that America is permitted to live her own life and to fulfill her mission in civilization according to American principles and ideals. We should not shut our eyes to things which are happening nor to the things proposed nor compromise one iota with those who would either hand her over to violence and disorder at home or betray her into the hands of aliens abroad.

Our first duty is to realize the situation. Men and women in the old days gave themselves over to the ease and indifference which always accompany a sense of security, yet Babylon's hours were being speedily registered. Those who were sheltered by place and enjoying power thought nothing of the fact that the emperorship was being auctioned from the parapets of Rome.

In every age people have mistaken their uninformed complacency for safety. "Better to be despised," said Edmund Burke, "for too anxious apprehension than ruined by too confident a security." Every man must realize that we are not only approaching a crisis, we are now in the very midst of it. The discontent, the spirit of unrest, the revolutionary forces are seen upon every hand, and these things are always indicative of greater evils which lie behind. It is not too late, however, to arrest the trend of events and turn back the onrushing tide sweeping us we know not whither. It is not too late to restore constitutional government, maintain here a policy of order and of regulated liberty, and preserve our independence and our sovereignty unimpaired, but it is now time to act with foresight and courage. There are no principles by and under which we can save the Republic other than those upon which we built the Republic. You can have some other kind of a government, you can have some other system, but you can not have our form of government or our system upon any other basis or upon any other principles than those upon which they were organized and under which for a century and a half they have been maintained.

Until now we have as a people entertained, sometimes vague in our minds but always strong and gripping in our conscience, a certain concept of national life and an uncompromising belief in our distinct and individual national policies. It has been handed down from father to son, even from Plymouth and Jamestown, that like another nation we were in a sense a chosen people—that something more than human foresight, something more than finite wisdom had guided a persecuted people to these shores and given vision and faith to those upon whom rested the stupendous task of erecting a new scheme of government and setting up a new standard of life. One less prone than I to detect divine agencies must still seek here to find the secret of the marvelous success of their work. We have been accustomed to believe that this particular scheme of constitutional liberty provided a process through and by means of which the legitimate desires and higher purposes of the people could ultimately and in an orderly and peaceful fashion find crystallization in proper and satisfactory rules of human conduct. We have cherished the hope that men would never again under our form of government be under necessity to resort to violence and force in order to realize and enjoy their rights. For nearly a hundred and fifty years we have held steadfastly to the principle that our independence, our sovereignty, should never be placed in pawn with foreign powers, that we could best serve humanity and best serve the tranquillity of our own people by remaining aloof from alliances with alien peoples.

But these two great principles, the foundation tenets of our national faith, are now under challenge. Thousands of our people—perhaps hundreds of thousands—no longer accept the orderly processes provided in the Constitution as satisfactory; they would realize their aims and purposes through violence and bloodshed, through disorder and indiscriminate murder. Thousands—perhaps hundreds of thousands—no longer accept the belief that we should hold our independence and our sovereignty free from foreign alliances. They would realize their aims and purposes through combinations and tribunals controlled not by our own people, guided not by the will and discretion of our own citizens, but by foreign powers. Our orderly and constitutional liberty is assailed on the one hand and our independence and untrammeled sovereignty are offered as a sacrifice on the other, the two great underlying principles which have distinguished us through the century, and under which we have wrought out, to the amazement of an incredulous world, this inestimable scheme of self-government. Both of these forces and each of these plans arrive at the same goal—the destruction of the Republic as we have accepted it and believed in it heretofore. Though actuated by far different motives, I grant you, both disregard utterly the teachings and traditions of American history and both would uproot the beliefs of the American people. Both are based on the belief that our scheme of government has failed; that the advice of the fathers and the experience of a century are to be set at naught. One begins by destroying the Constitution, the other commences by trampling underfoot our foreign policy, without which the Constitution would not have lasted a quarter of a century. Both are based on ideas and beliefs wholly foreign to our national life, imported from foreign climes, and both are at war—eternally and everlastingly at war—with Americanism.

Mr. President, the remedy, the only permanent cure for all these things is a renaissance of true Americanism, a manly, vigorous, national sentiment, a rebaptism of the old-time national spirit. Not Americanism for the people and an attenuated cosmopolitanism for the Government, not an intense nationalism for the masses and that internationalism which spreads all over the earth and is effective nowhere for those who would rule, but something of the old fervor, something of that apostolic devotion which against the whole world, its skepticism, its sneers, and its open opposition established here a new government, set up a new standard of civilization and heroically sustained them through the centuries, uniting and binding citizen and magistrate, the people and the Government in one glorious and unfaltering faith. This faith, the faith which arouses and sustains vast multitudes, the faith which defies and surmounts those confronting obstacles which seem often to close the path of progress to a people, this faith we must possess again; nothing can take its place. We have enjoyed a rich and bountiful country, rich, marvelously rich in natural wealth; we have been particularly blest in being widely separated from the tragedies and turmoils of the Old World; we have felt the uplifting power of noble institutions, but the thing which has made us the marvel of the world, which has sent us forward with impelling force has been the faith we have always had in our mission as a people, our destiny as a separate, distinct, and chosen people. If that be dead, if that has gone out of us never to be recalled and enjoyed, your censorship, your drastic laws, your denial of free speech and free assemblies are but the convulsions which precede dissolution. These things are not for republics and they never can be made a part of free institutions. They are the ugly and dangerous instruments of despotism, the use of which no people can invoke and remain free. I deny that the hour has come when American institutions and American ideals can not win in the open arena of debate. I reject the proposition that we can not succeed in a contest of ideas where discussion is free to all comers. The fault is not in our cause or in the weakness of the creed we espouse, the fault is in the timid, faithless character of its defenders. If we will do our duty, if we will show confidence in our cause, if we will manifest our belief in our faith, if we will apply the true principles of the American Republic which have been intrusted to our keeping for a brief season we need not fear to go into the open arena, for there we will win again the confidence, the admiration, and the support of all liberty-loving men; there we will restore and reenthrone in the hearts of the American people the principles of Washington and Jefferson, of Jackson, and all of the heroic dead.

Mr. President, not long ago I visited the place where Nancy Hanks, prematurely old and broken, nursed and nurtured and cared for the rarest soul ever born under the American flag. As you stoop and enter the hovel and reflect, as you will, upon the squalor and the wretchedness which a century ago environed those improvident inmates, and then call up in memory the glory which came out of that cabin, the glory which has since filled the earth, you will experience a deeper reverence and a stronger love for these institutions of ours than you ever felt before. There will come to you a feeling which both humbles and makes you brave, a yearning to know what is to be the destiny of this Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people," and, above all, what is to be the fate of the human family should this scheme of representative government fail. And as you drive away over the sad red hills of Kentucky, for this is Kentucky's impoverished spot, leaving behind you the sensations, the reflections, and the fancies of the brief hour, and turn your face toward the real world, with its bitterness, its turmoil, and its strife—social, economic, and political—you will find yourself involuntarily saying give us again in this supreme hour of the Nation's history men with faith, faith in the justice, the efficiency, and the ultimate success of these free institutions, faith that through our scheme of government and under our system of orderly and regulated liberty the human family is to reach its highest progress and enjoy its greatest happiness, faith that right, and right alone, makes might, and that upon this principle alone we dare to build for the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it would be strange, indeed, if I had not enjoyed and appreciated some of the oratorical flights of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It would be much stranger if, possessing ordinary common sense, I did not desire to bring him down from those empyrean heights to some consideration of facts. It would be still stranger if the Senator from Idaho could outdo me in eulogy of George Washington, a representative of the southern aristocracy, or of Abraham Lincoln, a representative of that class which has been contemned, despised, and made fun of as the "poor white trash" of the South.

The labored attempt during a long oratorical flight of the Senator from Idaho to connect the league of nations with "negro lynchings," with capitalistic insolent utterances, and with the proletariat tyranny of labor in America could not have been carried off by any man in the Senate except himself without tumultuous laughter from everybody on the floor and nearly everybody in the galleries. Mr. President, to a part of his flight we are all accustomed; we were raised on it on each Fourth of July; and it requires no unfaithfulness to American institutions to question it, however high it may fly.

We are not what the Senator calls us—"the chosen people of God." Leave that sort of chauvinism to Jews and to German junkers. Nobody on earth, so far as I know, constitutes "the chosen people of God." God judges His children in accordance with their thought and their feeling and their conduct, and not according to their nativity nor according to their naturalization. It is not necessary for any man in order to have pure Americanism to be narrowly chauvinistic; it is not necessary that we should stand around the table and drink beer and sing "America Uber Alles" or, much less, "America Alone in the World," as the Senator has to-day sung it. America is not alone in the world. She could not be alone in the world if she wanted to be. She is in the world with the balance of the sons and daughters of men. She is to be judged finally, nationally, and individually by her conduct and achievements, and, in connection with her conduct and achievements, chiefly by the answer to this question: Is she to exclaim with Cain, "I am not my brother's keeper"? Or is she to recognize brotherhood and fraternity with other men and the common fatherhood of God? The entire narrow chauvinism of the Senator from Idaho leads to the conclusion that we shall go out upon the broad arena of this vast earth, which is yet one of the petty planets in a great solar system, which is still only one of the petty solar systems in a great universe, and announce that "we are the chosen people of the All Ruler of it all"; that "we have to consult only ourselves"; that "we are not our brother's keeper"; that we have nothing to do with anybody else except to dictate our relationship with him. It is not only "America Over All" that the Senator would have us sing, but "America Standing Alone." Even the German junkers never sang that.

Mr. President, George Washington was wise in his day and generation. The Senator has paid a eulogy to him that the Father of His Country richly deserved. Thomas Jefferson in his time paid a grander eulogy to him than even the Senator from Idaho is capable of; John Marshall paid one, if anything, still grander; and Henry Lee, upon the floor of the Congress of the United States, when he pronounced him "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," went not one step too far. But, Mr. President, George Washington lived in his time and we are living in ours.

The Senator says that the essentials of civilization and of Americanism were then just what they are now. Of course, they were; nobody but a fool would deny that; but what are the essentials not only of American citizenship but of world citizenship and of Christian citizenship? The great essential being sought now by the world, which was sought above all men in his time by George Washington, is expressed in these few words—"a just and enduring peace."

George Washington of all men sought it, and, knowing that we were 13 little Colonies along the Atlantic Ocean, he always preached that we should intermeddle as little as possible with the affairs of the balance of the world, because we might be drawn into strife. But George Washington was no narrow chauvinist. He did not partake in that respect of the intellectual characteristic, or the chief intellectual characteristic, of the Senator from Idaho. He was a man of broad vision, of long vision, and saw down the aisles of time. He was one of the few men in his time that foresaw a great American democratic empire. He was as jealous then of the Mississippi River and its mouths and its headwaters as he was of any acre of land in the State of Virginia. And Thomas Jefferson, whom I almost worship as my political prophet, was like him; but Thomas Jefferson was also not a narrow chauvinist. Thomas Jefferson did not spend his life hating Great Britain, although he was one of the first men after Patrick Henry to raise his voice in Virginia against her German King's tyranny. It was Thomas Jefferson who threatened an English alliance when he wanted to call a halt upon Napoleon Bonaparte, the master of the world, when he said in those ever memorable words, "If you seize the mouths of the Mississippi River, we marry ourselves to the British nation and the British fleet." He that day threatened an "alliance"—not "entangling," but disentangling.

Thomas Jefferson was no fool when he said—and, by the way, it was he that used the language as an expression of our policy and not George Washington—"friendly relations with all and entangling alliances with none." He used this language advisedly, and he meant as much by the adjective "entangling" as he meant by the noun "alliance." Later on when James Monroe wrote to him, when Canning had first approached him on the subject of the Monroe doctrine as it came subsequently to be known, it was Thomas Jefferson who wrote back, "With her," referring to Great Britain, "upon our side, we need not fear the world." "We have a system over here, and they have another in Europe; they have dedicated their system to despotism and monarchy; let us dedicate ours to liberty and democracy." I am not quoting him verbatim et literatim. He said then, "Why can we not dedicate this hemisphere to liberty and democracy?" but he went on further to say, "There is only one enemy—Great Britain—that we may fear, and she now comes to us"—that was when Canning had approached Monroe—"offering not only to participate but to lead us in this new pathway." He added in substance, "No question so great has confronted my intellect since the question of independence itself."

Oh, Mr. President, it little becomes the Senator from Idaho, however much he may in his heart hate Great Britain—and I do not know whether he does or not, though I suspect that to be his ruling motive—to try to drag George Washington and Thomas Jefferson down from their high pinnacle as world statesmen who understood the world in their day to a narrow, miserable, provincial chauvinism which he himself represents in this case.

Mr. President, in that connection, I cut out of a paper the other day an article entitled "Are we our brothers' keepers?" I should like to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. BORAH. Is that a Japanese article?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Japan never heard of it. The interruption is in keeping with the Senator's chauvinism.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"ARE WE OUR BROTHERS' KEEPERS?"

[By W. H. Anderson.]

I.

The patient world through all its cycled years
Has borne its human burden, murmuring not—
A selfish horde, almost by God forgot—
A theme to flood the universe with tears!
From that far distance where there first appears
A ray to pierce the dark conglomerate blot
Spewed from creation's maw, the common lot
Of man, the creature, changes not nor veers;
A current rushing on from naught to naught,
Turgid and turbulent, 'twixt narrow banks
Of grasping greed and centered self-endeavor;
Each drop impregnate with the single thought
Of striving till all others it outranks,
Blind in its petty now to vast forever!

II.

This is the painted picture; this the view
Of cynic solons in our halls of state,
Venting their venomed envy in debate,
Cruel and heartless as a pirate's crew,
Shackling the many for the selfish few,
Clasping the hasp upon the book of fate,
Seeking the elder Cain to emulate—
"Are we our brothers' keepers?" Nay, not you!
But the great world is. War has fixed its fangs
Just once too often in the human breast,
And roused the nations to their sole surcease.
Nor shall we fail to heed our brothers' pangs,
The serried legions of this glorious West
Shall head the vanguard of the hosts of peace!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I repeat that the labored attempt of the Senator from Idaho to connect the league of nations with the lynching of negroes in the highly southern metropolis of Chicago, and Omaha, and Washington, and Wilmington, Del., and East St. Louis, and a few other places like that, and to connect the advocacy of the league of nations with a few absurd utterances of some capitalist whom he quoted, and whom I have forgotten—Gary, I believe—and to connect it with some of the absurd antics of labor just at this time, like the police strike in Boston, although he did not refer to that, is vox et præterea nihil, and although it be the vox of Idaho, it is still nothing but vox—pure voice and wind—spread out and dissipated upon the circumambient atmosphere, which may "tickle the ears of the groundlings, but must make the judicious to grieve."

Mr. President, when I think of the 12 little Jewish tribes, gathered in what now we call Palestine, boasting that they were "the chosen people of God," and then when I think of the German junkers, a little bit later on, under the leadership of the Kaiser, appealing to all Germany to recognize him as the chosen voice of God to lead "the chosen people of God," I must confess that I have very little respect for anybody anywhere who imagines that any people can be the chosen people of God. It just so happens that God does not choose his people here, anyhow. He chooses them after they are dead to people Heaven, and not beforehand to people the earth. It just so happens that I know something about this world; and whenever I meet an American telling me that he is necessarily the superior and that his people are necessarily the superiors of the balance of the world, I simply say, "That is your ignorance." The Danes are much better educated; so are the Norwegians; so are the Swiss, and very much more efficient as laborers, and just as brave, and just as honest, and just as true.

I have nothing to say that would detract from the great glory and the great history and the great ideals and the great purposes of this great American people. They are not the chosen people of God, but they may be the chosen of God if they will; they can make themselves the chosen people of God by choosing to go in God's way. That is the only way any people can manage that; and going in God's way does not consist in saying, "I am not my brother's keeper. Here is my house, here is my wife, here is my son John, here is my son John's wife; and we, and we alone, we constitute the universe." If American statesmanship can never rise above that level, then American statesmanship has already determined that the American people shall not be the chosen people of God, because God demands a different sort of conduct and service to himself and men.

Mr. President, I asked the Senator from Idaho while he was on his feet a while ago "what relevancy there was in what he was talking about then to this league of nations" that we had agreed to discuss. He chose to answer me not very politely, but his answer will stand, of course. I have not yet discovered any relevancy between his long talk, however oratorical and however eloquent, and the league of nations. I have discovered only a labored attempt to connect it with negro lynchings and with capitalistic insolence and with proletariat tyranny, in which contention he can not prevail; nor can the Senator pretend that he owes any greater allegiance to or possesses any greater love for the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States than I do, or, I started to say, forty-odd million people like me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has said that I replied to him rather impolitely. It is never my intention to be impolite to a colleague, however much I may differ with him. I was perhaps led away from my usual practice by what I considered the very irrelevant and impolite suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi that I was not discussing the subject before I had completed my first paragraph.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator had not only completed his first paragraph, but he had been talking quite a while; and I really thought at the time—and for that thought I now apologize, because I have now found that the Senator really did intend to get upon the subject after a long while and remotely—that the Senator was merely taking up time. That was the reason why I asked him whether his remarks were relevant to the question under discussion. It is always relevant to ask a Senator whether or not the remarks he is about to make are relevant to the question agreed to be discussed. An inquiry as to relevancy can not be irrelevant any more than an amendment to the Constitution can be unconstitutional.

The Senator describes, and very eloquently, too, the meaning of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and then he bursts into a little more of irrelevant eloquence. He said the reason why they succeeded was that we went at them purely "as Americans." Why, of course, we did. They were purely American questions. We did not want to call in the world outside to tell us why we wanted independence from what we regarded as the tyranny of Great Britain. We did not call in the world from the outside to frame a constitution to govern nobody except ourselves. But now the Senator wants us, when we are attempting to frame a constitution for a just and enduring peace among all the various nations of the world, to be the whole world by ourselves, and to cut out the balance of the world, and to say: "You have nothing to do with it." He said that the President of the United States said that "the league of nations" was "greater than the Senate of the United States." God pity the league of nations if it were not! The whole trouble in the Senator's entire talk is that he confuses chauvinism with patriotism. Patriotism does not consist of taking all you can get. It frequently consists of giving all you reasonably well can, just as an enlightened selfishness does not consist in taking, from either of you, all that I can get, but consists at least equally as much in giving you all that you are justly entitled to and that I can spare.

After all is said and done, Mr. President, statesmanship—real statesmanship—and Americanism—genuine Americanism—neither of them differs from any other form of common sense and common ethics. I remember a friend of mine once who made a business proposition to another man, and the other man said: "I do not think that is quite fair to me." My friend said: "I never made an unfair proposition to any human being in my life." That is the spirit that ought to animate a nation. If there be any doubt about it, solve it against yourself, just as an honest man will solve anything where there is a real doubt rather against himself than against the other man.

Mr. President, when George Washington lived he devoted himself to seeking a just and enduring peace. So did Thomas Jefferson. That is what I, in my humble way—"humble" is hardly the right word, because sometimes I am not subjectively humble—but, to put it in the objective, that is what I, in my obscure way, am seeking to-day when I advocate the league of nations. I am seeking "a just and enduring peace"; and the President of the United States, God bless him, has sought it in Paris, has sought it in London, has sought it in Rome, and is seeking it in these United States. He has spent energy, intellect, and almost life, and he has received curses and calumniations, has had to endure the charge that he was un-American, the charge that he was unpatriotic. One man accused him of "seeking to be a king." What a fool the accuser is and what a fool the accused would be!

It was well said years ago that "republics are ungrateful." Ah, the little particularists of the days of George Washington swore and snarled and barked at him, and in the days of Thomas Jefferson they called him "pusillanimous" and "cowardly" because he hesitated about getting into war that might involve the liberties and destinies of these poor, little, weak Colonies, then only 15 or 16 in number, and in George Washington's time only 13. But Washington and Jefferson both stood it, and American public sentiment subsequently has said that they stood it well. Woodrow Wilson is standing it, and posterity will say that he stood it well.

It is given to no man to insure success to himself; it is given to every man, however weak in intellect or soul, to deserve it. Woodrow Wilson has deserved it, and, as Webster said of Massachusetts, whatever may be said about his future, his past is safe. He may not be as great a man as some other men who have lived. He does not think he is, I do not, and you do not. But he is as honest a man, with as much intellectual integrity, as God has ever created. As Thomas Jefferson said of old John Adams, "he is as honest as the God who made him."

The Senator from Idaho is preaching peace and not violence when negroes are involved, when capital and labor are involved, when American industrialism is involved—"peace, orderly settlement by arbitration or by the courts, no violence"; and in one of his oratorical flights he said he had hoped "the time had passed when controversies would be settled by violence." And yet, when he comes to international force he is standing athwart the pathway of the very thing to which he has paid so high a rhetorical and oratorical tribute. He wants America to stand isolated. Why, Mr. President, she could not stand isolated 48 hours if she wanted to. If all the people in America concluded to give the Senator from Idaho a czardom to-morrow and let him govern the country by ukases, and nobody could vote except him, and nobody had any say except him, he could not, by any pronunciamento of his, any ipse dixit of any sort, determine upon and maintain isolation for the United States from the strife and turmoils and worries of the balance of the world by her own announcement, or in the supposed case by his own announcement, because I supposed the case where he would be the czar, and the women of Idaho even would not have any voice, so we could not in referring to America say "her"; we would have to say "his" then. He could not do it if he wanted to nor if all the other hundred millions of America supported him enthusiastically as their czar and equally wanted to.

A little row breaks out in Sarajevo, in Bosnia, and some lunatic shoots a grand duke. We use every endeavor of which we are capable to keep out of the row, and the President uses every endeavor of which he is capable, almost to the point, as his enemies charged, of pusillanimity. But we could not keep out. The President was elected upon the theory that "he has kept us out of war and is determined to keep us out of war," but he could not do it. Even I sat down upon the plantation and wrote to him, the day the Lusitania was sunk, "For God's sake, give the Kaiser 72 hours of an ultimatum to apologize, or pay damages, or go to war," and you all know what a passion for peace I had. You can not keep out of the world, my dear boy; you can not do it to save your life. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

You are a part of the world, America is a part of it, and as little as you think of it, you as a Senator and I as another Senator—both, perhaps, not exalting the position too highly, at least one of us—are parts of the world. When I say "one of us," I mean myself, of course.

Mr. President, one other little point that has nothing to do with this I will touch upon. The Senator from Idaho has referred to the lynchings that have occurred, and has quoted various things from some negrophile, I suppose. The man who wrote it and the Senator both forgot to mention that in Omaha and in Washington both those riots took place because negro men were violating and outraging or attempting to violate or outrage white women; and these were not Southern cities; they were Northern cities. I go as far in the pathways of peace as any man who was ever born. I am willing to arbitrate nearly everything in this world, except one thing, and that is the attempt to outrage a white woman by any man, whether white, black, or red. I surrender him at once, as being beyond the pale of the law, to the first crowd that can get to him. I believe in law. I believe in law and order. I believe that there is no justification for taking the law into one's own hands. But I believe that there are now and then provocation and excuse enough for it, and the four or five attempts here in Washington to outrage and violate white women, and the confessed and proven attempt in Omaha, in my mind, deprive good men who are white and civilized of all inclination and of all power to say one word against the men who undertook to capture the criminal and execute him.

Not only is blood thicker than water, but race is greater than law, now and then; and if race be not greater than law, about which there might be a dispute, the protection of a woman transcends all law of every description, human or divine. I take part of that back; it does not transcend divine law, because it is a part of the divine law. God made us to protect our women, and we are going to do it. And yet all this has been talked about, especially these riots in Washington, and not one word said about these vile beasts who, out here in Takoma Park and in Omaha and elsewhere, have been trying to violate white women. Not a word has been said by the negrophite from whom he quoted or by the Senator in condemnation of the miserable black beast in Omaha who paid a just debt to justice, if not to law, or the black brutes in Washington whose conduct aroused the mob. Let a man steal your pocketbook if he will. Let it become his; 'twas yours. Let him kill you if he will, kill your son if he will, and you can still carry it to court. But when it comes to violating weak, helpless, and innocent women, there is no time in ordinary human nature to go to court.

But here stand gentlemen who elsewhere write about all that, and who have plead for law and plead for order, while women—helpless, poor, physically helpless things—are being treated by beasts in any way that the beast chooses. And yet these same men do not want any international peace and order by preestablished law.

Senators talk about "America doing as she pleases." There is nothing in the league of nations that keeps America from doing as she pleases, except when America shall choose, if she shall, to carry on an unjust war, offensive and unprovoked, and refuses to arbitrate the controversy or carry it into an international court. If that time shall ever come, no outlaw nation—not even America, if she should become one—ought to be permitted to "choose her own course." Yet here stands a gentleman who wants a rapist carried into a municipal court, but is not willing to hold a rapist country, as Germany was in the last war when she invaded Belgium, to law but leave her to her own law.

It was the Germans' plea that "military necessity gave her the right to go through Belgium if she wanted to," and that "the State was responsible to nobody," that "there was no higher law than the State." The only difference is that the German junkers said the German State, and the Senator from Idaho is saying the American State.

There is nothing that can occur in international affairs that can so stiffen the sinews, summon up the courage, and inflame the passions as many things which occur in the domestic relations of a people. Yet the Senator from Idaho stands with me in saying that there is no justification for taking the law into your own hands if you be an individual, while he contends that there is all justification and nothing but justification if you be a nation. The only difference between him and me is that I say there are sometimes provocations which excuse it in an individual, and he does not go even that far. Yet he is not willing to apply the same law to unjust outrages committed by one people or nation upon another.

Mr. President, I do not know whether Jesus Christ was the Savior of man or not; I have been taught it. I do not know whether he was the Prince of Peace or not; I have been taught that. I do not know but what the heathen gods of Rome and Greece control the world; but I have been taught that they do not. If the gentle Nazarene who walked by the Sea of Galilee and promulgated his great doctrine was the Savior of mankind and was the Prince of Peace, then in my opinion—in which, however, of course, I may be mistaken, because I am not infallible—the man standing athwart the way of the nations of the world entering into a covenant to keep the peace of the world, to make it "a just and enduring peace," has gone back to heathendom, and, like the Germans, is not worshipping Jesus of Nazareth, whatever other gods he may worship.

In the case of the Germans they evidently worship Oden, Thor, and Frei—Thor especially with his hammer, his symbol, the very impersonation of the might not only of a State but of a heathen and false godhead. We English-speaking people long since came to the conclusion that if Thor was a god we did not want any god—not that sort of a god, anyhow. If a State be irresponsible, and stands by itself in this world to be the sole judge in its own case, to execute justice outside of its own boundaries, in its relations with the balance of the world, just as it sees fit, then I want no State in mine.

The Senator invokes "the established law of the State," and yet he is not willing to establish or invoke a law for the civilized nations of the whole world! He stands against all recognized world law to which we may bind ourselves together with the balance of the world. He rails against "limiting our sovereignty" within any bounds of world law, even agreed on by ourselves. He is perfectly willing, and some other Senators are perfectly willing, to see the league of peace adopted, provided we stand out from under all of its obligations. He is not even willing to go into the pretense of signing it with any sort of reservations or amendments of any description. By the way, I do honor to him in that respect. I understand his position to be that he will vote for amendments and reservations and that after we have adopted them, if they shall be adopted, he will vote against the whole business. In other words, he will do his utmost to ruin the whole thing before it comes to a vote, and then he will, having emasculated and poisoned it, vote against it.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has me right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought so. The Senator says I have him right. I want to say in eulogy of the Senator from Idaho that that is a very much higher and more honest and less hypocritical ground to occupy than that which some of the other Senators have occupied.

The Senator from Idaho went on and gave an interesting description of two classes of thugs and murderers of men that hardly spoke to one another. He did not know what a true picture he was drawing of this fight on the league of peace. On this floor there are men who want to murder outright the league of nations and so much of the treaty of peace as involves the league, and then on the other side there are the poisoners. They just want to poison it; they just want to take the life out of article 10 and the balance of it, just to give it an anesthetic and let it die the white death, bleed white as Prussia proposed to bleed France. These two factions, unlike the other two classes of savages to whom he referred, do speak to one another, though I doubt if they have much respect for one another, but I have a good deal more respect for the thugs that want it murdered with a bludgeon than I ever had for the poisoners.

Here is the thing: You have to take it or you have to leave it, and you know it as well as I do. If you send it back to 27 different nations, including our enemies, that is substantially the end of it. You know that Serbia will be there with her row with Roumania; you know that Roumania will be there with her row with Hungary; you know that Poland will be there with her row about Silesia; Italy will be there with her row about Fiume; you know the wily Turk, rested a bit by now, will be there. You know that everybody will have about two amendments apiece to every one that you send back. You know it means chaos; you know it means a boiling cauldron, and I am afraid you know that the President of the United States has no longer the physical strength to go back and try to settle the seething, boiling thing. I stand with the President in his last utterance. If you want to kill the league and the treaty, kill it; if you want to bludgeon it, bludgeon it. Come to the issue as quickly as you can and be done with it, only do not poison the life out of it. If you are not willing to make this attempt for a just and enduring peace for the entire world, just say so. If not, stand out boldly and say you do not believe in that sort of thing anyhow, that you think it a piece of impossibility, "an irridescent dream," as Ingalls said about common honesty, and that it can not be accomplished. But whatever you are going to do, take the responsibility for your act. Above all, do not act like Lucretia Borgia—do not poison. If the Senate wants to pass an interpretative resolution after it has ratified the treaty, do it, not as a part of the ratification but as the opinion and interpretation of the Senate of what they have done. Then go to the league of nations and try to impress upon it those ideas. If America is there, if the great Anglo-Saxon Commonwealths of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Great Britain are standing with her, as they probably will be, there is very little doubt of the fact that any reasonable amendment would be adopted.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article from a Pittsburgh newspaper, entitled "The Crisis," written by John Corntassel. The couplet which heads it reads:

> The great world's altar stairs
> That slope thro' darkness up to God.

He ought to have said "out of the darkness," except that it would have ruined the rhyme. That is quoted from Tennyson—

> "Out of the darkness" of war and barbarism and chauvinism, "into peace, up to God."

I have stricken out of the article with a lead pencil a lot of things which struck me as being personal and for which I am not willing to stand sponsor. I ask unanimous consent, striking out those parts and substituting asterisks for them, to publish the editorial as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

THE CRISIS.

[By John Corntassel.]

> "The great world's altar stairs
> That slope thro' darkness up to God."
> —Tennyson.

"The United States approaches one of the greatest crises in its history.

"The most momentous question involving the civilization of the world—the league of nations—is in danger, held up, delayed, and threatened with defeat, through the conspiring efforts of a few * * * Senators.

"The Constitution providing that all treaties must be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, it therefore is necessary to secure 64 votes to ratify, thus enabling a small minority to defeat the league treaty, and thus undo the combined six months' efforts of the statesmen of 30 nations of the world to accomplish a great object.

"In this country, ruled through party government, it is seldom that any political party controls two-thirds of the Senate membership. When party lines are therefore drawn and a measure made a party issue, its passage becomes quite difficult.

"Certain Republican Senators * * * have made of this question a party issue, hoping thus to humiliate and disgrace the leader of the Democratic Party. These men have thus far obtained a certain following.

"They receive the praise of the German propagandist and sympathizer.

"They hear the encouraging yelp of the Irishman who hates Great Britain.

"They receive the encouragement of the makers of war materials.

"They listen to the plaudits of the military clique whose profession is war.

"They are praised and fawned upon by their following of personal bootlickers.

"They receive the applause of the disappointed office seeker.

"They hear the yapping of the little men, who are jealous of another's success.

"They listen to the rappings of the knockers generally—those who otherwise know not how to attract attention.

"All these persons create some noise, and the little Senators imagine they hear the call of the people.

"Therefore do these few * * * proud * * * Senators, always seeking the spotlight, and hoping that presidential lightning may strike in their vicinity, hold up, delay, confuse, complicate, and attempt to destroy by amendment the greatest humanitarian charter of modern times—the treaty and the covenant of the league of nations.

"For Christ's sake—and I mean it not profanely—let us, the people of this great American Nation, stop this nonsensical, uncivilized, and barbarous attempt to stultify America and demand—demand immediate ratification of the treaty!

"Let us send to them now, and at once, the real call of civilized America, united and unafraid, demanding that they do their duty toward humanity. Not the call of Democrats. Not the call of Republicans, nor of Socialists, nor of capitalists, nor of laborites, but the call of the Christian people of America to ratify at once this covenant of the nations to procure and secure the future peace of the world.

"Little wonder is it that the President claims the opposition comes from ignorance. It is the ignorance and neglect of the intellectuals—those who should know better.

"Why not wake up, men and women of America? Do something in this crisis. Otherwise, some day, your son also may have a resting place on the battle field of some fair country, with the 10,000,000 young men just recently gone before.

"Who are the intelligent teachers, advisers, and commentators who especially should endeavor to arouse the people?

"The preachers? Yes, surely. The followers of the Prince of Peace owe something to humanity. When it comes to raising funds to succor a few Armenians harassed by the Turk, the pulpit resounds against the desperate character of the situation.

"In God's name, why does not the pulpit now endeavor to instruct, inform, and influence the Christian people of the United States of this crisis in their country's affairs, affecting as it does the future of the world? Or must one conclude that war is a part of the Christian doctrine and the use of force necessary to its advancement?

"The editors? Indeed, yes! They more than all others are the instruments by which knowledge of present-day events is disseminated. These brilliant men, trained in arriving at quick conclusions, surely must realize the necessity of arousing the people and creating public sentiment in favor of this momentous question. The time to do it is now. It is the most important thing in the world. All other matters by comparison are trivial. It is larger and greater than anyone imagines. The President visions the importance of the occasion, and is attempting to awaken the people. The opportunity is here. It is greater than any man, any party, or any combination in the Senate. The defeat of this treaty and the league of nations by the United States of America is too horrible to contemplate—the results of its rejection too painful and ignoble to consider. The press owes a duty to the Nation to-day and immediately. Why not suspend the hero-worshiping attitude toward returning warriors and center the minds of the people upon the 10,000,000 dead who will never return? Or do the editors also desire another and more wars? It is a time to exhibit real patriotism right now.

"The lawyer? They likewise seem not to appreciate the gravity of the situation. This country has been built up in its Government largely by them. The construction of our splendid system of civil liberty and the administration of justice we owe to this class. It is time for the bar associations and the legal fraternities and the individual lawyers to step forward—they also are leaders and teachers of the people and opposed to the use of force in the settlement of disputes. The erection of a supreme council of the nations is now in progress. A push in the right or wrong direction will make or mar this wonderful structure and great experiment. The time to further the cause of peace and civil liberty is now.

"The doctors? They also, friends of humanity, entering the homes of the people, owe it to themselves and their country to open the eyes of the ignorant and attempt to secure a friendly attitude for the treaty.

"The business man, the worker, everyone, men, women, and children, need an awakening. Most of us since the great tragedy of the World War have settled down to our individual work and pursuits, forgetting that the results of that great event are upon us and must be wisely dealt with. Many details of living distract us. The effort alone to live to many is great. We may and do, therefore, forget that the greatest event of modern times, the ratification of the peace treaty and the league of nations, requires our help with continued patriotic fervor.

"This in order that war may cease. That posterity may bless us. That America remain first, as always, in the estimation of the world. That the United States will at least take a chance to further civilization. That Christianity as we know it is not dead. That we, the people of the United States, decline to stand for all time before the world as a Nation of hypocrites, pretending to be advocates of democracy, yet refusing to join the other nations in an effort to democratize the world. Last, but not least, that we decline to humiliate and discredit the Chief Executive of this country, the first man among the statesmen at the peace conference, the President of the United States of America.

"'Saepe intereunt aliis meditantes necem.'"

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had not intended to take up any of the time of the Senate at all this afternoon, but it seems to me I was rather challenged to do it.

I want to add one more thing, Mr. President. I do not see for the life of me why I should invoke or why any man should invoke any sort of political partisanship in connection with this question. As the Senator from Idaho knows, and as you know, I am an extreme partisan. I am a southern bourbon Democrat who has forgotten very little and remembers everything in the shape of past injury to himself and his race and his section, but there are points beyond which I think no partisansh'p should go. I would be ashamed of myself if I permitted my course in connection with a purely international or foreign question to be dictated by domestic politics. I am sure I can say just as much for the Senator from Idaho, because he is by heredity and environment less of a partisan than I am, and I am sure that his attitude toward this question comes not out of partisan politics but out of what I consider a narrow Chauvinistic Americanism and what he considers pure patriotism. I wish that everybody approached the question from his standpoint and from mine—openly, honestly, with love or with hatred for the "great adventure of world peace" not under cover, not hypocritically, not as poisoners.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I refer particularly to the negro lynchings now, although I referred to them rather incidentally in my former remarks. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] stresses the proposition that I was seeking to inject a sectional discussion into the question of the league of nations. I was very careful to state affirmatively that these lynchings could in no sense be considered as indigenous to any particular part of the country and reflect upon one part of the country no more than upon another.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me——

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. I also omitted, out of extra precaution, any effort to localize the articles which I read, in order that there might not be any possible inference that I was seeking to call up anything like sectional feeling.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that if I said he was trying to intrude a sectional issue, I did not mean to say it. I did not think that he was. I may have said that he was intruding a racial issue into the matter, but not a sectional one. I do not think I did. If I did, I will see that it is stricken out of the RECORD. I did not mean to say it.

Mr. BORAH. I will be glad if the Senator will look over his remarks. I think he will find that I am correct.

But, Mr. President, there is another phase of the question of lynchings upon which the Senator from Mississippi laid much stress that had nothing to do whatever with the theme which I was undertaking to present. Of course, whenever the question of lynchings is raised there is a particular and certain feature of it presented for the purpose of justifying that which can never be justified, and that is the taking of human life without due process of law. If the cases could be confined to those cases where parties were actually guilty of this crime, undoubtedly the people generally would be disposed to pass them by and to justify them from that standpoint, but the evil is that that which is justified from that standpoint immediately spreads and becomes a disease in a community and men are lynched for the most incidental and trivial crimes.

There were 218 negroes who lost their lives through violence during the first year of this war. At a time when the negro boys were displaying most remarkable courage and heroism upon the other side of the water these lynchings proceeded. When the Negro race was giving all for the Republic 218 of them died by violence in this country—men, women, and children—and less than 3 per cent of them were charged with this unmention-able crime. There was no intimation that they were guilty of this particular crime, behind which men seek to justify this universal lynching of a race.

Neither does it stop with that race. As we know, the lynchings have not been confined to the colored race by any means during the last several years. I referred to these lynchings in my remarks to-day as an evidence of that lawless spirit which is seizing hold of the American community and which has become in a measure a disease of the American community as simply one of the indications of that disease.

I further declare, although it may shock the mind of the Senator from Mississippi, that under my theory of government and taking into consideration the ultimate welfare of the entire human family and particularly that portion of it which dwells under the American flag, there can be no justification for the lynching of any human being. and the man who preaches it is sowing the wind and will reap the whirlwind for the American people. I do not care how black the skin or degraded the position in life, how unfortunate a human being may be, if this Republic does not protect the lowest as well as the highest, already the seeds have been planted which will ultimately lead to its disintegration. It is natural for anyone to become deeply aroused over the question of the protection of women, but no form of lawlessness can ultimately bring security to the women of this land. Lawlessness begets all the diseases of which communities die.

How are you going to know about a man's guilt or innocence? Would the Senator from Mississippi hang men, burn men, torture men upon a newspaper report, upon rumor, upon hearsay? Would he take human life until the severest test had been placed upon the testimony as to the guilt or the innocence of a man? Once, perhaps, you may secure the guilty party, but a dozen times you secure the innocent; and can there be anything more revolting to the human mind than to know that even one individual has suffered innocently under a government of order and of law? Although, Mr. President, these matters were not mentioned for the purpose for which the Senator from Mississippi seemed to think, I refer to them to this extent by way of explanation of the attitude in which he would undertake to place me.

The Senator from Mississippi assumes to be somewhat surprised at the attitude of the Senator from Idaho and even somewhat angry with the Senator; but he has no occasion to be surprised at my position. I am advocating here upon the floor to-day what the Senator from Mississippi has advocated consistently, persistently, almost ostentatiously for almost 40 years of his public life. Prior to the last two years I challenge the Senator from Mississippi to present out of all his speeches and all his writings anything in contradiction of the position which I now take with reference to the foreign policy of this Government. No man has more ably and more persistently advocated what he calls the isolation of the American Republic, the policy of Thomas Jefferson, the policy of George Washington than has the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. How can he be so intensely surprised that one should continue to advocate, for a short season, at least, after he has ceased to be its advocate, the policy which he has preached time and time again in the other House and in his writings, which he has persistently presented to the American people as the only true, the only safe, the only reliable policy for our Government?

The Senator says that he is not guided or controlled by partisanship. Possibly so; but it is a coincidence at least worthy of contemplation that, after advocating these policies so persistently for 40 years, he should receive his new light at the same time that his distinguished party leader changed his position.

So far as the question of partisanship is concerned, I do not think this ought to be a party question; but the only way, in my judgment, in which it could be relieved from partisanship would be for all parties to condemn it. I have been charged with being in favor of making it a partisan question. I have been misunderstood if that has been the interpretation of my remarks. I was in favor of my party declaring for the prosecution of the war; but I did not understand that by that I was making the war a party question. I wanted the party of which I was a member to take an advanced and determined stand with reference to the protection of American rights as they had been challenged by a foreign Government. All parties were in favor of the prosecution of the war. It could not, therefore, be a partisan question. I am equally anxious that the party of which I am an humble member shall take a position upon this question, because it is distinctly an American question, involving no less than the perpetuity of American institutions. If some other party should declare upon the other side, that would make it a party question, but that would be no reason why I should not want my party to stand absolutely in favor of what I believe to be the correct position from the standpoint of the interests of the American people. I venture to say, Mr. President, that before another 18 months shall have passed the voters of the Republican Party will take that position. Some of the leaders may arrive by relays, but they will finally arrive. If, as has been intimated, it is to be made an issue in 1920, I am nevertheless in favor of the party of which I am a member taking a position upon it. If it is made an issue, I shall be intensely happy to find myself a member of an organization which stands four square to every wind that blows in favor of American principles and American institutions. I go further and say, to show I would not regard it as a partisan question in the sense that a party could bind a man's action, that I would not be a member of a party which would either remain silent or indorse this treacherous proposition. This is one of the kind of questions which makes and unmakes parties, which brings about realignments. Every party worthy of the name should declare itself and then let men align themselves accordingly.

The Senator says that I want to drag George Washington down to my narrow conception of Americanism; that I want to limit his views to what my views are with reference to the duties of the American Republic. George Washington met this question just as we are meeting it, and under most similar conditions. A most remarkable duplication of world affairs in 1789 on to 1800 and up to 1815 is to be found in the conditions which have been presented to us during the last six years. The whole world was in turmoil while George Washington was President. There was a war which had been raging for years; there was a conflict which extended over all Europe, involving many countries which during this war were neutral. There was a belief that the teachings of the French Revolution were to sweep like some fear the teachings of the Russian soviet government throughout the world and engulf all established institutions unless there was an organized stand against them. William Pitt denounced the French Revolution, not as the representation of any individual or set of individuals, but simply as an "armed system" which must be destroyed or else it would destroy the established institutions of the world. Edmund Burke denounced it as a scheme to undermine property, to destroy all established institutions, and begged his country to take a stand which would result in the destruction of it in France, as it is claimed to-day we should go into Russia and into other parts of Europe and through combined power and effort, in various ways, eradicate what is called the Bolshevist theory.

All Europe had been at war during these years, and the question was presented to Washington whether the United States could or whether the United States dared to stand alone in a world of turmoil and dissension. Notwithstanding the fact that we were but 13 States, lately colonies, without an army and without a navy, with no means to defend ourselves practically against an ever-encroaching system of destruction aimed against all established institutions and all regulated orderly liberty, he said deliberately that it was his opinion that the only way by which we could establish here a republic and maintain it was to remain aloof from all permanent alliances with foreign powers.

Washington never supposed, I imagine, that the United States could—and I presume no one now thinks that the United States can—remain an isolated nation in the sense which the Senator from Mississippi used the term. We are a world influence; we are a world power; we will exert our influence and we will exert our power as we have to the advantage of the world for more than a century. Washington understood that quite as well as he understood the other policies which he advocated. The mere question of geographical isolation was an incident to the principle which he advocated. I have no doubt at all, Mr. President, that if Washington had been alive he would have entered this war immediately after the sinking of the Lusitania. He would have done so because the sovereignty and the independence of the Republic were challenged, because the rights of American citizens were invaded; but he would have entered it as a separate and independent and sovereign nation, though acting in conjunction with other powers, and he would have departed from the conflict as a separate, independent, and sovereign nation. He would not, in my opinion, according to his teachings, have surrendered that which he went into the war to maintain; that is, our independence and our sovereignty. He would have believed, as he did believe, that we could be a greater influence for peace, a greater influence for good, and maintain more effectively our own happiness by remaining free than by yoking ourselves up to foreign Governments.

What was the Washington doctrine, if I may refer to it again, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi? It was simply this, that the United States should retain the right to determine for itself, untrammeled and unembarrassed by any foreign obligation, its duty in every emergency as that emergency arose; in other words, he refused to contract 10 or 20 or 50 years ahead as to what the American people should do—not that they should not exercise their influence if the crisis should arise, not that they should not exert their power if the necessity should arise; but that they should determine it upon their own discretion, according to the facts and circumstances as they existed at the time the emergency did arise. We can not have an independent and free Government upon any other theory. His advice was to remain out of permanent alliances; that is to say, if in 10 years from now an exigency should arise which would call for the action of the American people, it should be decided according to the facts as they exist 10 years from now, and not according to the facts as they exist now, plus a contract to be construed by a tribunal composed of others than the representatives of the American Republic.

What we are proposing to do here is to enter into a contract that, if in 5 or 10 or 15 years from now or 20 years from now the territorial integrity of some foreign nation shall be challenged, we will enter into a war to protect the territorial integrity of that nation, regardless of whether or not the people of the United States 15 years from now consider it a righteous war. We agree in article 10 that we will protect the territorial integrity of all members of the league. If, 20 years from now, somebody assails the British Empire, or if Egypt starts a rebellion and Germany comes to the assistance of Egypt, we agree to furnish aid in protecting that territorial integrity, regardless of whether the people at that time think it is right or not. You can not be an independent and a free nation and enter into a contract that 20 years from now you will protect real estate, regardless of how the party got the real estate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to say from this side that we dispute absolutely the correctness of the Senator's statement.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt of it. There are as many interpretations of the covenant of the league of nations not only as there are advocates, but there are as many as there are speeches in its favor. If article 10 does not mean that, and if it does not mean that we are to protect the territorial integrity of foreign nations, then it has no meaning at all. If it does mean that, it means that we are to protect it regardless of how Great Britain or any other nation got it.

A few days ago, after the Versailles conference had convened and while it was in session, the British Government entered into negotiations behind the Versailles conference to establish a protectorate over Persia. Apparently without any knowledge upon the part of the delegates of the United States, and certainly without any knowledge upon the part of the French representatives, because they have proclaimed the fact that they had no knowledge, Great Britain enters into a treaty with Persia by which Great Britain establishes a protectorate over Persia. Persia is now in protest against that proposition. They claim that their independence has been jeopardized, if not completely surrendered.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt to ask him to make it clear that they allege that their independence is gone; that, in substance, they have been annexed to the British Empire.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. Then while the conference is going on a treaty is consummated by which Persia is annexed to the British Empire over the protest of the Persian people.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator can not expect us to assent to such a preposterous statement as that. A treaty peaceably entered into, without any show of force, can not by any possibility be construed into something that Persia is protesting against. Persia has accepted it because Persia gets sufficient consideration out of it to warrant her in doing it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I repeat, without any fear of successful contradiction upon the fact, that the masses of the Persian people are utterly opposed to this proposition; that they have made their protest known in every way that a people could make it known; that even the delegates who were at Paris to represent the Persian people, and who were asking for independence themselves, were not consulted, and they themselves are protesting against it. But while Great Britain was in Persia with her armed forces she concludes a treaty which in its practical workings destroys the independence of Persia.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I presume probably that if this were a peaceful, ordinary negotiation resulting in a treaty the Senator would find no fault with it. I presume there is no reason why we should not negotiate, for instance, with Great Britain at this time for the acquisition of some islands in the Pacific Ocean over which her sovereignty is undoubted without any violation of the treaty or without consulting the Versailles conference. The only ground of objection to the treaty with Persia, it seems to me, would be that it has been imposed upon Persia by force majeur. If that is the case, is not that very properly a subject for consideration by the league of nations, and is not that the real and the only recourse that the people of Persia have? Would the Senator from Idaho, for instance, advocate that the United States engage in war for the purpose of reestablishing the independence of Persia, which he seems to think has been endangered?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; indeed.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then what course would the Senator suggest under the circumstances? The league of nations proposes a tribunal before which controversies of that character may be heard, and I understand that the Senator does not want that done. Now, just exactly what course would he take to protect the rights of Persia?

Mr. BORAH. Under what clause can you go inside of the British Empire and take up a question for solution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Article 11 would take care of it very well, and article 10 would take care of it. Article 10 will take care of it very beautifully if the fact is that England has invaded the territory of Persia. If she got it by fair, proper bargaining with the Government of Persia, no one has any right to complain at all.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If, on the contrary, she did not but by force or fraud she has possessed herself of the territory of Persia, every nation on earth stands bound by article 10 to resist that aggression.

Mr. BORAH. You can not move under article 10, you can not move under article 11, without the unanimous consent of the council; and you get the unanimous consent of the council, of course, with Great Britain having one vote, and her five colonies having five if it gets to the assembly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I do not think that upon reflection even the Senator from Idaho will undertake to stand by that assertion.

Mr. BORAH. I say a good many things without reflection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Well, I think the Senator has at this time, anyway. It is not very often that he does. I will admit that much.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the obligation under the first sentence of article 10 is absolute and complete. It does not wait upon any action by the council in any sense whatever. No nation can escape its obligations under the first sentence of article 10 by voting against the course suggested by the rest of the members of the council under the second sentence of article 10. Article 10 provides that each nation shall undertake to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member. That obligation is absolute, complete, perfect, whenever the occasion arises. Now, it goes on to say that the council shall advise as to the method by which this obligation shall be enforced. But if the council does not advise, the nation is not exonerated from its obligation under the first part of the article at all. So that it is plainly in contravention of the language of the article to insist or to urge that the obligation in any manner whatever rests upon action or inaction by the council.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator, upon reflection, will not wish to occupy the position in which he has placed himself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I think so.

Mr. BORAH. I think not, on reflection. Article 10 says:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

When this league is finally ratified—if that unfortunate day should ever arrive—we will find the British Empire with Persia annexed and with Egypt annexed; and whatever our obligation may be, whether enforced by the advice of the council or whether it is an original, primary obligation, it nevertheless devolves upon us to protect all the territorial integrity that Great Britain has at the time we enter into the league.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I should like to add a few other considerations to the discussion of this Persian question.

First, that the agreement entered into between Great Britain and the Persian Government is in contravention of the constitution of Persia.

Second, that the representatives of Persia appeared before the Committee on Foreign Relations and made their protest, as the Senator from Nebraska might have known if he had chosen to attend that session of the committee.

Third, that the secretary of the peace delegation of Persia at Paris protested and insisted that Persia was overrun with British troops at the time this agreement was forced; and to that I might add that under article 21 of the covenant all regional understandings are validated.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Montana have spoken about a "peaceful negotiation." It was peaceful. It was a policeman's peace. English troops were in possession of the Persian territory; and while they were in absolute control of the Persian territory, this treaty of peace, so called, was negotiated. Now, I stated as a fact which I do not think can be denied, because the French papers have all published it, that this peace treaty was negotiated without any knowledge upon the part of the French Government or the representatives of the French Government. It was negotiated at a time when the delegates of the United States were uninformed of the fact that it was going on. It was negotiated without the knowledge of the representatives of Persia, who were at Paris asking for independence. It was negotiated at a time when the English troops were in complete possession of Persia, and it was negotiated in violation of the plain provisions of the constitution of Persia. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, when we enter the league of nations Great Britain will undoubtedly claim that Persia is a part of the British Empire; that it has been annexed and therefore comes under article 10, and must be preserved as we preserve the territorial integrity of all members of the league.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is aware, is he not, that the representative of the British Government has publicly denied the statement that the independence of Persia is in any way impaired and has asserted that Persia remains independent; and he is inaccurate in his statement that Persia was at Paris asking that her independence be recognized, because her independence is recognized in this very treaty, and Persia is named as a prospective member of the league of nations, invited to join it later on. The independence of Persia has been recognized——

Mr. BORAH. No; the independence of Persia——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator desire me to finish?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The independence of Persia is recognized by the very treaty the Senator is fighting, and the declaration which he makes that the independence of Persia has not been recognized has been publicly denounced as a falsehood by the representatives of the British Government.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I undertake to say that any man who will examine the Persian treaty must conclude, without any hesitancy at all, that the so-called independence of Persia is the merest myth. Persia can not do anything under that treaty which a sovereign, independent power may do without the consent of the British Government. Her economic affairs, her financial affairs, her political affairs, are all subject to the censorship, the direction, and the control of the British Government. It is true, as has been pointed out by the French authorities, as has even been pointed out by English authorities, that there is a line in the Persian treaty which speaks of the independence of Persia. But it is also true that that has been denounced as a manifestation of the insincerity of those negotiating the treaty, for the reason that while they speak of the independence of Persia, they take away, by the terms of the treaty, all of her independent rights.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if Great Britain has announced that Persia is independent, certainly Great Britain will be in no position to claim, as a member of the league of nations, that Persia is a part of the British Empire and is not independent.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what Great Britain has announced except what is in the treaty itself. But she will undoubtedly claim that all the rights that the treaty guarantees her are legitimately hers, and although she should nominally still concede that Persia is independent, yet undoubtedly she will contend that Persia is a part of the rights and holdings of the British Empire, because the treaty makes that beyond question true.

So I say, Mr. President, getting back to the original proposition which I was advancing, that if in 10 years from now Persia should undertake to secure her independence and Germany, or any other power, should undertake to give her assistance, undoubtedly the British Empire would have the right, under article 10 of the covenant of the league, if she saw fit to do so—although she might not think it necessary to do so—to call upon the United States to act and to cooperate with her.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to inquire, if Persia is regarded by the treaty as an independent Empire, upon what basis Great Britain could ask us to join with her, when we undertake simply to protect her territorial integrity and political independence? But, Mr. President, I content myself at this time with saying that whatever the truth about the matter may be the league of nations, as I contend, at least affords a forum through which the world can be advised of the facts, and recommendations at least can be made if an obligation does not arise under article 10. I inquire again of the Senator from Idaho what he has to offer by way of a solution of these troublous matters.

Mr. BORAH. I have nothing in the way of a solution to offer for any difficulty between Persia and Great Britain. What I am insisting on here is that the United States should not obligate itself to take care of just such situations as that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yet the Senator puts the case that that very controversy may again precipitate a war between Great Britain on the one side and Germany upon the other side, which will undoubtedly involve all Europe, and possibly involve our country.

Mr. BORAH. I have advanced no such proposition as the Senator has suggested. What I said was that if, in 10 years from now, a war results by reason of the fact that Great Britain has undertaken to incorporate Persia, and by reason of the fact that Germany should give assistance to Persia, the United States should have the right to decide at that time according to the facts as they exist, and the people who shall fight the war should have a right to determine, untrammeled and without contract, whether or not we should go into that war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The difference between us is that if we enter into this agreement now Germany will not undertake to do anything of the kind.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, well, of course——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And then we shall not be confronted with the necessity of entering into the next world war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. The Senator says that if we enter into this contract Germany will not undertake to assist Persia. Of course, that is pure speculation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is speculation on the Senator's part when he says that Germany will enter into war, and I speculate that she will not if we enter into this agreement.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. But what I say is that, whether Germany does or does not enter, the United States retains her absolute independence to determine, upon all the facts and circumstances at the time, what she will have to do with it. We will not find ourselves tied to a war if we do not like the war or if the people then living think that Persia is entitled to her independence, and therefore we will not force her back into submission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and Germany, thinking again, as she did the last time, that we will not go in, will be prompted to go in. But knowing that we will go in, knowing that we are bound to go in, knowing that every other nation upon earth which is a member of the league will also go in, the probabilities are that she will not make war.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says we are bound to go in. I want to know if it is the position of the Senator from Montana that this contract binds us, regardless of what our views may be at that time, to go into that war? Let us have this out now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. All right.

Mr. BORAH. The President of the United States has said time and time again that we do not have to go in unless the Congress of the United States shall determine at the time that we shall go in. But the Senator says we are bound to do so. Which horn of the dilemma does the Senator take?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Idaho knows perfectly well the sentiments of the Senator from Montana upon that subject. They were expressed here in my speech on the 12th day of June; they have never undergone any change since, and they are not in any sense in conflict with any views expressed by the President of the United States. Under the first sentence of article 10, I repeat, our obligation is absolute and perfect whenever a war of aggression is made against any other member of the league.

Mr. BORAH. And Congress has no discretion about it at all?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wait a minute. The thing is excellently illustrated. Whenever anybody is threatening the territorial integrity or the political independence of another country, the obligation of this country is undoubted.

Mr. BORAH. Has Congress any discretion at that time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Congress of the United States is called upon in every single instance to determine whether the territorial integrity or the political independence of the other member of the league is threatened, so as to bring this obligation into operation in the particular instance. A very excellent illustration is this: The Congress of the United States would be called upon to determine whether the territorial integrity of Great Britain is threatened by a war made by Germany upon Persia. According to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] concerning the Persian-English treaty, the political independence or the territorial integrity of Great Britain is not affected at all by a war of that kind, because England, he asserts, has no territorial rights in Persia, no dominion over Persia whatever, under the treaty. Whether that is correct or not, I do not know. It will be for the Congress of the United States at that time to determine whether the territorial integrity or the political independence of Great Britain is threatened.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. This is degenerating into a chorus.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me to be a solo.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me——

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment, and then I will permit the Senator from Nebraska to interrupt me. The Senator from Montana said a few minutes ago that if the teritorial integrity of the British Empire were assailed, this country was bound to go in.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. It is for us to determine whether it is assailed or not.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator then said that beyond that, the mere fact of territorial aggression, Congress could not go.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By external aggression.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand him now, the Senator states that the question of territorial integrity is the only question which the Congress has a right to determine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of political sovereignty.

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment until I get an answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I assert that whenever this country is in any manner called upon, or it is suggested that its obligation under article 10 has arisen, the Congress of the United States determines whether the condition set out under article 10 exists, namely, whether the territorial integrity and existing political independence of another member of the league is threatened by aggression. If it is, then it is the duty of the United States, under this treaty, to do whatever is reasonably necessary upon its part to prevent that threat from being accomplished.

Mr. BORAH. Then I understand the Senator from Montana to this effect: First, that we are bound, whenever the territorial integrity of a nation is involved by external aggression, to go to the protection of that nation. But the Senator says, second, that Congress may determine for itself whether or not its territorial integrity has been assailed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. Beyond the naked fact of whether or not it has been assailed, the Congress of the United States can not go. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In determining whether its obligation arises or not, that is as far as it can go. But it could go further in determining just exactly what steps it will take.

Mr. BORAH. I am not interested in the proposition of procedure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wait a minute. I am. It will then be called upon to determine just exactly what steps it will take to redeem its obligation. Some one might think that we ought to declare war; but Congress might think that commercial isolation will meet all the requirements of the case.

Mr. BORAH. Now, Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator, that is not the point in which I am interested. The method of how——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is the one, however, to which the Senator's inquiry leads.

Mr. BORAH. Very well; we will reach that later. But the point in which I am interested is this, leaving out now the method in which we shall discharge our obligation, whether we shall do it by a blockade, or whether we shall do it by an armed force; whether we shall send men, or shall simply use economic pressure. Keeping these out, what I want to know is, does the Senator concede that the Congress of the United States may go any further in determining our obligations than the mere naked fact that territorial integrity has been assailed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It can go no further than the exact language of the covenant. It is just exactly the same as if a man goes out with a gun to shoot another. We never stop to inquire the right or the wrong of the controversy; we go out and stop him from shooting.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. That is precisely what I want to know. When we do go out to inquire into the shooting we inquire whether it was a righteous and just shooting which could be excused under the law. What I want to know is whether or not the Senator concedes that the Congress of the United States may go into the justice or injustice of the situation, the moral or immoral features of the situation; or whether we must be satisfied with the mere fact that territory has been assailed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We must be satisfied with the mere fact that the territory has been assailed, for the very purpose is to cut out the question of the rights or wrongs of the war, to stop all wars, and require the nations to submit their controversies to arbitration.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. Once a people are in bondage, forever in bondage.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the very heart of the whole thing.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, Mr. President, that is precisely where the league of nations lands us.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. It is not a question of justice or injustice, not a question of liberty or oppression, but a mere question of whether or not Japan has seized territory or Great Britain has seized territory, however unjustly, and that territory is afterwards assailed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment until I get through. Mr. President, I want to take an illustration right here, to show that this league is founded upon the same principles which have guided and moved kings in Europe from time immemorial—mere territorial possession, regardless of the justice of the position, regardless of the rights and liberties of the inhabitants.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. "We shall hold this piece of territory," says the despot; "it does not make any difference how we got it"; and now we have organized a tribunal, which has no conscience, no right to sympathize, no power to inquire into the morals of the question, or into its righteousness, but you find Great Britain or Japan or other nations in possession of territory, and, regardless of how they got it, regardless of the liberties of millions of human beings, you say they shall keep it, and that the Congress of the United States can not go beyond the question of finding out who is in control of the real estate. Human life, human happiness, the yearning souls of millions for independence Congress can not consider.

I will give you an illustration: In 1882 Great Britain entered Egypt under promise to give her her independence. In 1914 Great Britain set up a governor over Egypt under promise to give her independence at the end of the war. The Egyptians came to Versailles for the purpose of presenting their case to the Versailles conference. Great Britain denied them a hearing. In the treaty, section 147 confirms the protectorate over Egypt upon the part of Great Britain, and Egypt is now a part of the British Empire and is entitled to protection under article 10. Ten years from now the Egyptians start a revolution. They start to fight for their independence and some foreign nation gives them aid. The Government of the United States is called on by the British Empire to afford assistance in maintaining her territorial integrity, which is confirmed in this particular treaty. Under the argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] the Congress of the United States can not inquire into the history of how Great Britain got Egypt. All they know, all they are permitted to know, is that Great Britain has Egypt. Regardless of the fact that those people are fighting for their independence or their liberty, regardless of the fact that morality and justice are upon their side, the Congress of the United States must sit here like an automaton and, either through economic blockade or through military force, protect the territorial integrity of Great Britain. And if by force, then American boys must be conscripted to fight the Egyptians back into submission. What an inhuman, cowardly business it would be!

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, of course, a very long question.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not a question at all; it is argument.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question really addressed to me was as to whether right and justice had anything at all to do with the question.

Mr. President, we are endeavoring to set up a tribunal before which the question of right or justice in any international controversy may be determined, instead of allowing those controversies to be determined by the arbitrament of war. This plainly means that if Egypt has any complaint about any condition concerning her relations with Great Britain, she can not depend upon Germany to precipitate another World War to help her out of her controversy with Great Britain, but it must be submitted to the league of nations and be determined by the nations of the world as to what is right and just in relation to the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me? In the case that the Senator speaks of, how would the league settle it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to the rules of justice and common sense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will have to put his question more definitely.

Mr. LENROOT. It would require the unanimous vote of the council, would it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is another matter. The Government of Germany, of course, might easily urge before the world that it was starting out to grant to the people of Egypt their liberty. Think of it! The people of Germany, out of the goodness of their hearts and their devotion to the cause of human liberty, starting out to restore to their fellows of Egypt the liberties of which they have been deprived by the Government of Great Britain.

But, Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin asks me how the league would settle that kind of a proposition, I would say that the league would thereupon make Germany an enemy of the world, and all the world will say to Germany——

Mr. BORAH. "War! War!"

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; "keep your hands off."

Mr. BORAH. We can settle it by war without the league——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. One at a time, please.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator will bear in mind that I have the floor. I yield to the Senator to proceed, however.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not yet answered the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BORAH. Please do so, then.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the application comes from the people of Egypt, of course it must come under the provisions of article 11. In that case, as a matter of course, Great Britain would not vote upon the question at all.

Mr. BORAH. It can not come from Egypt, for Egypt is not a member of the league. But if that construction is true, under article 11, if the Philippines should start a revolution for the purpose of gaining their independence and Japan should assist them, could the league take the Philippine question out of our hands and settle it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; by that act Japan would make herself the enemy of every other member of the league.

Mr. BORAH. But as a matter of procedure——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Leave Japan out.

Mr. BORAH. As a matter of procedure, if the Philippines should undertake to secure their independence and should seek assistance from any nation, could the league assume charge of settlement of the question and pass upon the independence of the Philippines?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question is not clear to me. I do not know whether the Senator introduces another nation or not. If the Senator introduces Japan or any other nation, then as a matter of course article 10 would come into operation.

Mr. BORAH. I think it would be the same condition with reference to Egypt. Article 10 would come into operation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. And article 10 obligates us to preserve it and not interfere at all.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Philippines alone got into a controversy, does the Senator from Montana say the league could settle that question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the same question I have previously answered. In my address of July 28 the Senator will find at large my views about what would take place.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to bring him back to where we originally were diverted?

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to be brought back to that yet.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Senator has in mind giving me an opportunity to touch upon that matter.

Mr. BORAH. I have, but I want to proceed for a moment with this other proposition.

I think it of considerable interest that we have finally determined, according to the advocates of the league, just how far the Congress of the United States is permitted to go. Undoubtedly Senators will agree that if the question which we have been discussing should arise now without any league of nations, the Congress of the United States could survey the entire field, it could pass upon all the facts of the justice or injustice, of the righteousness or unrighteousness of the holding; it could determine the question of whether it was likely to lead to a world war; it could determine the question whether the United States would likely ever be involved in it. The whole field could be surveyed by Congress, and in the wide and unlimited discretion of Congress, Congress could decide whether or not we would enter into the conflict.

If it be true, however, that the effect of the league of nations is to cut out of consideration all questions except the mere fact of external attack, then we have certainly deprived the Congress of a vast amount of its powers as a legislative body.

For instance, let me better illustrate it. Suppose we should not enter the league at all and in five years from now Persia should seek her independence or Egypt should seek her independence, and Germany should assist, and the matter would come before Congress as to whether or not we should participate in that conflict. The entire field would be open to investigation and consideration. A man would have just as much right as a Member of Congress to vote against action on the ground that Great Britain's position was unjust as he would have upon any other ground. He would have just as much right to vote against it upon the theory that it would be a local war, and therefore never become of interest to the United States, as upon any other ground.

But if we enter the league and in five years from now that condition of affairs arises, then Congress can do but one thing, and that is to determine the physical fact of whether or not the territorial integrity has been assailed. If they determine that it has, as a mere question of fact, then it is the duty of Congress, either under the advice of the council or without it, to engage in the conflict, either by economic blockade or by military force, and there is no discretion left in the matter whatever.

I am pleased that that position has been made plain. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the discussion was diverted we were upon the deliberate statement of the Senator from Idaho that the independence of Persia had been destroyed, and that Great Britain would claim that Persia was no longer independent, but a part of the British domain, and that we would be compelled to defend Great Britain in that claim. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the very first article of the treaty which Great Britain and Persia have negotiated.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to it whatever, but I have read it time and time again.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have it in the RECORD along with the Senator's statement. It reads:

> First. The British Government reiterates in the most categorical manner the undertaking which they have repeatedly given in the past to respect absolutely the independence and integrity of Persia.

Does the Senator think that Great Britain, after having entered into a treaty of that sort and made that solemn declaration, could by any possibility claim before the league of nations or before any other tribunal in the world, that Persia was not an independent nation, but was a part of the British Dominion? Does the Senator not know that this treaty, which he denounces as secret and done in opposition to the will of the people of Persia, must be ratified by the Persian Parliament before it goes into effect?

Mr. BORAH. So far as the first proposition is concerned, with reference to having actually recognized the independence of Persia, I have already referred to that proposition. I have not on my desk, but I will undertake to bring here to-morrow, the construction of that clause, in the light of the other clauses of the treaty, placed upon it by French authorities and by English authorities, including men who were in attendance upon the Versailles conference, in which they say that that particular clause of the treaty only adds hypocrisy to the other unjust features of the treaty; that in view of the fact that the other provisions of the treaty rob Persia of all her rights as a sovereign power and take away from her any independent action, that Great Britain is now in control of Persia and in control of all her functions of government. What Great Britain will claim, of course, I do not know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what Great Britain could have said more absolutely binding, as far as the rest of the world is concerned, than the words which I have read? Could they have been made stronger to bind Great Britain?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator asks what Great Britain will finally do and what Great Britain will finally claim.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I do not ask that. I said the statement that Great Britain would ever claim that Persia had to become a part of the British Dominion, in view of the wording of the treaty, is absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; that is a strong argument.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for one question before he undertakes to answer that?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I should like to have the Senator from Idaho ask the Senator from Nebraska if he knows what engagement Great Britain entered into with Turkey with reference to Egypt to which France was a party, and whether or not Great Britain has kept that engagement?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not familiar with those engagements.

Mr. FALL. I thought not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am talking about something which we have now before us. I say the evidence is conclusive that Great Britain recognized the independence of Persia, and she can not by any possibility come into court and claim Persia as a part of the British dominions.

Mr. FALL. But she has come into court and claimed India as a part of the British dominions and has had the claim allowed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska asked a few moments ago if the Senator from Idaho thought in view of this plain declaration, that Great Britain could or would claim that Persia was a part of the British Government. I can only arrive at a conclusion in regard to that by reason of what has happened in Egypt. When Great Britain went into Egypt she gave Egypt assurance that it was for the purpose of protecting her independence and finally establishing the independence of Egypt. She repeated that assertion in 1914; but notwithstanding the fact that she had said, as plainly as she says in this treaty, that she would protect the independence of Egypt, she even denied the Egyptians an opportunity to be heard at Versailles, and then insisted that the President of the United States, even before the matter was reached in conference in the commission, should consent to establishing a protectorate over Egypt; and that was finally ratified in article 147 of the treaty.

In view of what happened in Egypt, of the assurance, the promise of independence, in view of the fact that Egypt furnished soldiers in the war whose valor was commended by the English generals, in view of that fact that it was asserted over and over again that England was in Egypt for the sole purpose of ultimately establishing their independence, and in view of the fact that the Versailles conference finally ratified the protectorate and placed Egypt under the control of England, and she is now claiming it is a part of the British Empire, what reason has the Senator from Nebraska to assume that the same course of procedure will not take place with reference to Persia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assume it and I assert it for the reason that Great Britain is now making a contract with the United States. Great Britain has committed sins in the past, but Great Britain is entering into a contract with the United States, and I repeat my statement that Great Britain, after definitely agreeing that Persia is to be independent, would never have a right to come to the United States and say, "Help us protect our dominions, including Persia." The Senator may wander from Persia to Egypt, he may go from Egypt to India, he may go to the uttermost parts of the earth, but he ought to take back the statement he made about Persia.

Mr. BORAH. I am not conscious of having made any statement that I ought to retract, and I will, to-morrow or on some other day soon, present the construction placed on the Persian treaty by Englishmen themselves.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that the construction some Englishman has put upon it would bind the Congress of the United States to recognize it?

Mr. BORAH. No——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would we not be justified in taking this treaty as it is? What do we care for the interpretations that may be put upon it? You can find interpretations of everything; we have had some ridiculous interpretations of article 10; but we do not believe there is anything in them, and we will never recognize them.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator has no very great sympathy for interpretations.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has just said that the Congress of the United States can not consider the question as to whether this is right or wrong; that all it can consider is whether there was an act of external aggression, the right or the wrong of the matter being beyond the consideration of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska referred to the fact that Great Britain is now making a contract with the United States which he seems to think will entirely change the policy of Great Britain. At the time the Persian treaty was made this contract with the United States was in process of negotiation; at the time the Persian treaty was consummated the contract with the United States had been ratified by Great Britain, and she was bound in spirit, if not in letter, to the terms of the contract which we are now asked upon the part of the United States to ratify; but, notwithstanding the fact that she was bound by it, she consummated this treaty without bringing it to the knowledge of the United States at all. She consummated it without bringing it to the knowledge of her other copartner, France, at all, and I say, therefore, we have a right——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has not been consummated, Mr. President; it will not be consummated until it is ratified by the Persian Parliament. It was not made public in process of negotiation, just as other treaties have not been made public, but it has got to be made public when it goes before the Persian Parliament.

Mr. BORAH. The English Government claims now that the Persian treaty was consummated. That is the position which they take.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will recall the evidence before the committee upon which he is depending, it shows that the treaty referred to had not been consummated; that it had to be ratified by the Persian Parliament; and the election of the parliament is yet to be had in Persia; so that the people are going to pass upon it.

Mr. BORAH. I am not relying upon the testimony before the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the testimony before the Senator's committee upon which he must depend.

Mr. BORAH. I am not relying upon that testimony; I am relying upon statements coming from those at the Versailles conference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has quoted the representatives of Persia; I am quoting the language of the representatives of Persia before the committee.

Mr. BORAH. I am quoting the representatives of Persia at Versailles, not here; but in any event——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to suggest to the Senator also that if there is anything in the Persian treaty that is inconsistent in any manner with the covenant of the league of nations it is taken care of by article 20, which reads:

> The members of the league severally agree that this covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that if the Senator is correct in the position which I understand him to take, that Great Britain, in violation of her obligations under the covenant, entered into the treaty with Persia, the treaty with Persia of course would not be regarded by any of the other nations under article 20 as of any force and effect.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know how it would be regarded; but I know it would require the unanimous vote of the assembly to abrogate the treaty with Persia.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would not require such a vote provided the treaty with Persia is inconsistent with the league covenant. In that event the council would not be called upon to do a thing about it. If the treaty referred to were made the basis of any action by the Government of the United States, and the Senator is correct that it is inconsistent with the obligations of Great Britain under the covenant of the league, the Government of the United States would not pay any attention whatever to it.

Mr. BORAH. Somebody must decide whether it is inconsistent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Government of the United States would determine that for itself.

Mr. BORAH. If the Government of the United States would decide the question for itself, then, as I understand, the position of the Senator is that under article 20, not the council and not the assembly, but each Government decides for itself whether or not it is in contravention of the league of nations covenant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is not any such power granted either to the council or to the assembly.

Mr. BORAH. Then, does each Government decide for itself whether or not a treaty is void?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I assume so. That is the power it has now.

Mr. BORAH. If it does, the United States simply decides that it is void as to the United States, but Persia is still bound by the treaty with England.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. Persia will determine the question for herself.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the decision of the United States can not declare the treaty void except as to itself. It can not declare it void as to other nations, either Persia or Great Britain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Every nation has the same right.

Mr. FALL. Then, if every nation has the same right, if the United States can decide as to whether a treaty is good, bad, or indifferent, or whether the United States should recognize it or not recognize it, or assist in enforcing it or not assist, as it pleases, where is the league; what has become of it?

Mr. BORAH. It has been retired for repairs.

Mr. FALL. The league is gone this afternoon, Mr. President.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall seek an opportunity to address the Senate upon the league of nations, and shall do so unless other business of the Senate prevents.

NEUTRALIZATION OF TRANSPORTATION IN CHINA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on September 11, 1919, "That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate a copy of the report made by Mr. Paul Whitham on 'Neutralization of transportation in China,'" I am constrained to say that, after a thorough consideration of the resolution and with every desire to meet the wishes of the Senate, I am of the belief that the public interests would not be conserved by the transmission to the Senate of the report requested.

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Mr. CURTIS. I move, as in legislative session, that the Senate adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 29, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, that the whole family of mankind may look up and call Thee Father, since we are so involved in boundless and immortal love, a love that will not let us go.

The clouds of sin, strife, iniquity, may obscure the light of heaven with its warm and fructifying rays, but at last the most obdurate heart will yield to its influence, under the leadership of the incomparable life and character of Thy Son, who died, rose, and ascended into heaven for humanity. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 27, 1919, was read and approved.

CONFERENCE OF LABOR, CAPITAL, AND AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 9.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 9, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 9.

Whereas the President of the United States has called or is about to call a conference of the representatives of labor, capital, and agriculture for the purpose of discussing questions relating to these great interests as affecting each other and the people: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States indorses the action of the President in calling such conference and pledges to him its earnest support and cooperation for the success thereof.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object I think we have got more important business pending here than passing resolutions of indorsement and cooperation, which probably would not be appreciated if tendered, and which certainly are not needed anyhow. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

COLD-STORAGE LEGISLATION.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9521.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, the cold-storage bill, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of, and deception with respect to, cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee adjourned on Saturday there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], to which a point of order was reserved by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read for further information of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KING: Page 4, line 9, after the word "month," insert the words:

"Provided, That every retail dealer in foodstuffs in the District of Columbia shall keep conspicuously displayed in close proximity to all cold-storage foods offered for sale by him a sign plainly marked with the words 'cold storage': And provided further, That the management of all dining cars operated in interstate commerce and of all restaurants and eating places in the District of Columbia, and serving cold-storage food, shall mark in plain letters on all their bills of fare opposite the name of such food the words 'cold storage.'"

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, a point of order——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think a point of order has been reserved. If not, I reserve it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Oh, yes; the gentleman has the floor.

Mr. KING. I suggest that the point of order be settled by the Chair, after argument, before the amendment is taken up.

As I offer the amendment in good faith, not for the purpose of discussing it, I would like to have the gentleman who raised the point discuss it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of bringing the matter to a discussion, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. The point of order is that it is not germane to the legislation now before the House.

Mr. KING. That is "a point of order," not "the point of order." "The point of order," as I understand it, has an entirely different meaning in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas make the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I make it to bring on the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan want to be heard?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this has no relation to cold-storage business, and it has no relation to this bill. And as to the requirement in railway dining cars, it would compel the marking of "cold storage" on food that might not have been in cold storage at all. There is a limitation and direction as to when and under what circumstances the dealers in the District of Columbia shall put up a sign "Cold storage," but there is no limitation or designation as to the matter of railway dining cars.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. KING. Just for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. KING. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the mere fact that the dining-car management might put up a sign "cold storage" as to some articles on the menu offered for food has nothing to do with the point of order. The point of order is this: Is it or is it not germane to this bill?

Now, I understand perfectly well that the title says that it is designed to prevent deception. I also understand that the title never has any reference to a bill as it comes in here and it is an entirely foreign matter. It has nothing to do with the point of order.

I understand, furthermore, that the statements made by the gentlemen of the committee have really nothing to do with the bill, although the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], who has just spoken, says this is a cold-storage bill and that he has seen and heard and smelt nothing but cold storage in the discussion of this bill. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], who is chairman of this committee, says it is purely a health measure, designed to protect the ultimate consumer. It is the ultimate consumer that we desire to protect in this matter, he says.

Now, leaving out all these immaterial matters as to the title of the bill and as to the character of the bill as stated by members of the committee, the only thing we can rely on is the substance of the bill itself. The bill is not limited to cold-storage warehouses, but is a general bill for the regulation of cold storage. What could be more in order than to regulate the action of the retailer who disposes of this stuff directly to the consumer?

Now, under this act, he can take a carton of food directly from the cold-storage warehouse and open it up in his store and sell it for fresh stuff. "Oh," they say, "these gentlemen will not do anything of that kind. They are all honest here in the District of Columbia." Yet, what do we find with reference to eggs? Here is a basket of eggs from cold storage. Here is another basket i the same store, from the farmer. The storekeeper puts no sign on either one of them but sells them all for fresh eggs.

Now, if we desire to protect the ultimate consumer, why should not the retailer be compelled to state without deception what he is selling? This is to regulate cold storage and the sale of cold-storage products in the District of Columbia. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the statesman we love so well, stated on the floor the other day that he wanted this bill so fixed that when it said "spring chicken" on the dining-car menu he would know which spring was referred to, whether it was this spring or last spring. [Laughter.]

Now, what harm is there in this restaurant downstairs or the one in the House Office Building, or the dining cars when they serve us with chicken or fowl of any kind, stating that it is cold storage? Mr. Chairman, it is one of the most pertinent and germane amendments that could be offered to this bill. I dare say that during the winter in this House there are at least 3 or 5 per cent of the membership suffering all winter long from ptomaine poisoning which they get from eating the cold-storage food that is served in the House restaurant; and if the truth were known, it would be found that the President of the United States, on his long trip to the Pacific coast, was served with cold-storage food, so that he is now suffering from nothing else than ptomaine poisoning.

While arguing the point of order, perhaps I have digressed slightly from the point, yet it was done for the purpose of showing the chairman that this amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the bill deals with cold storage. It has nothing to do with the disposition or sale of food, and the question how the food shall be sold is entirely different from the question how it shall be treated when in cold storage. The bill is confined entirely to the cold storage and not to the sale of food, and of course the amendment offered by the gentleman is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is rather far-fetched when it undertakes to regulate dining cars and restaurants under the head of cold storage, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on the bill generally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, if the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. FESS] were upon the floor, I would be tempted to use enough of my time to recite a little poem which I heard him recite at one time about Silas Brown who, if elected to Congress, would make everything his constituents sold go up, and everything they bought come down. I am of the opinion that no matter how hard we struggle with this question, it still remains an economic proposition and everybody knows we can not fix values by legislation. And while we have undertaken to curb certain practices and follow the request of the President, we all know that what we purchase to-day is just as high or higher than it was when we began to legislate for the purpose of bringing down the high cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind, this bill is a food-control bill, pure and simple.

I think that is its purpose, although in its title it is called a warehouse bill. It is in accord with the messages of the President delivered to the joint sessions of Congress upon his arrival home from Versailles and Paris August 8, and before he made his western trip on the league of nations. In that message he said:

> To the same end, I earnestly recommend, in the second place, that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt. It would materially add to the serviceability of the law, for the purpose we now have in view, if it were also prescribed that all goods released from storage for interstate shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. By this means the purchaser would always be able to learn what profits stood between him and the producer or the wholesale dealer.
> It would serve as a useful example to the other communities of the country, as well as greatly relieve local distress, if the Congress were to regulate all such matters very fully for the District of Columbia, where its legislative authority is without limit.
> I would also recommend that it be required that all goods destined for interstate commerce should in every case where their form or packages makes it possible be plainly marked with the price at which they left the hands of the producer. Such a requirement would bear a close analogy to certain provisions of the pure-food act, by which it is required that certain detailed information be given on the labels of packages of foods and drugs.
> And it does not seem to me that we can confine ourselves to detailed measures of this kind, if it is indeed our purpose to assume national control of the processes of distribution. I take it for granted that that is our purpose and our duty. Nothing less will suffice. We need not hesitate to handle a national question in a national way. We should go beyond the measures I have suggested. We should formulate a law requiring a Federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license, or in the conditions under which it is to be issued, specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profits in the method of marketing. Such a law would afford a welcome opportunity to effect other much-needed reforms in the business of interstate shipment and in the methods of corporations which are engaged in it; but for the moment I confine my recommendations to the object immediately in hand, which is the lower cost of living.

I am in favor of warehouses and of cold-storage plants, and if I thought that the present bill would in any way destroy them, or the use of them, I would vote against it. I think warehouses and cold-storage plants do two essential things. They furnish a supply out of season and stabilize prices. The bill will not seriously hamper business or diminish the supply of food for the purpose of enhancing prices. Its good feature is that pertaining to the public health in prohibiting the sale of unwholesome food, which every State now prohibits. It also compels the sale of all cold-storage products once a year, except cheese, which is better and more wholesome the longer it is kept for seasoning, I presume, to acquire the wholesome qualities of limberger. I quote section 3 of the bill, which embodies its principal provision:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person to (i) ship, or deliver for shipment in commerce, or (ii) hold in cold storage while in commerce, or (iii) sell or offer for sale in commerce, or (iiii) having received from shipment in commerce, sell or offer for sale in the original, unbroken package, any article of food that is or has been in cold storage, unless such article of food or the container thereof is plainly and conspicuously marked in accordance with this act or the regulations under this act, (1) "Cold storage," (2) with all the dates when put in and when taken out of cold storage, (3) together with the name and location of all warehouses in which so stored: Provided, That the statement that the article is a cold-storage food may be removed in the event that before the expiration of 30 days following the date when such article of food was first placed in cold storage it is sold to the consumer thereof.

But the bill in its title takes a fling at hoarding, and the report at profiteering.

Of course, hoarding and profiteering are made criminal under the statute. But the statute does not define what hoarding is or what profiteering is, so we have to leave those questions for the courts and jury to decide. Who is the chief hoarder? I noticed by this morning's paper—the Detroit Free Press—that the Government has sent to the city of Detroit 296 carloads of food to be sold in that city alone. I notice that there are to be sold in this city of Washington some 70 carloads of food. If this is the condition the country over, it would seem that Uncle Sam has a considerable stock on hand and has held onto it pretty well.

I recently had occasion to make a day's trip on the cars, and while I do not want to charge Uncle Sam with profiteering I thought when I was charged on one of his dining cars 15 cents for a glass of ice tea costing less than a cent; 25 cents for an ear of corn on cob, costing 25 cents a dozen; 25 cents for half a cantaloupe, costing 5 cents apiece; 10 cents for bread, formerly given with the meal; 65 cents for one-quarter of a pound of broiled fish, costing 15 cents a pound, I thought charity should begin at home, and Uncle Sam ought to set the example or be made an example of. He also charges about the present retail prices for his goods.

I want to say something about the wheat crop of 1918.

Mr. Chairman, the other day the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY] said he did not know how the Government was going to meet the deficit of $3,500,000,000 revenue to pay the appropriations for the current year. I would like to say to him that we appropriated $1,000,000,000 to maintain the price of wheat at $2.26 a bushel, and that $1,000,000,000 will not be used for such purpose and can be covered back into the Treasury. My basis for that assertion is that in 1918, when we maintained the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel, it did not cost the Government anything, and the Government of the United States made a profit upon that of $23,000,000. I do not know whom that profit came out of, whether it was the farmer or the consumer. I guess out of both; it was taken out of the price of wheat bought from the farmer and out of the pocket of the consumer. Uncle Sam made a profit, in 1918, of $23,000,000 by maintaining the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel. And this year, instead of being charged up with the $1,000,000,000 that we appropriated for maintaining the price of wheat at $2.26 a bushel, Uncle Sam will make $25,000,000 profit on that experiment. So we say that there will be at least $1,000,000,000 that can be covered back into the Treasury, which will leave the deficiency $2,500,000,000 instead of $3,500,000,000.

Since we have been agitating this question of the high cost of living and talking about profiteering and hoarding, the only man whose products have been lowered in price and brought down is the farmer. The farmers of this country have lost hundreds of millions of dollars in the last few months in the reduced price of their live stock. I do not know how a farmer can buy a steer at 22½ cents a pound to feed and then have the price reduced to 14 cents and make any money out of it. I do not know how a farmer can give $1.75 or $2 for a bushel of corn and feed it to a steer when that bushel of corn will put only 5 pounds of flesh on the steer, and then sell the fatted steer at 14 or 17 cents a pound when the corn costs 30 or 40 cents to put that pound of meat on the steer. I do not know how he can make any money out of that. The same is true of sheep and hogs. A hog will take on 10 pounds and a sheep will take on 5 pounds, the same as a steer, from consuming a bushel of corn. So we see who is made to bear the loss in these declining prices, and that is the farmer. He is the man who produces the food on which we live. He is the man that is taking all this loss.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In just a minute. I want to say a little more about that. In the days of the rise and glory of the Roman Republic agriculture was the main industry in Italy. In the seventeenth century England was the chief country in agriculture.

Everybody knows the conditions to-day—the unrest in the country. But that is not an exact statement. The unrest is confined to the cities where many of the country people are flocking for higher wages and shorter hours. No one can blame a man for that. They will go where they can do the best. If a man can do better by staying in the country than he can by going to the city, he will stay in the country. When he can do better by going to the city than he can by staying in the country, no one can justly blame him for going to the city. In the city, as a general thing, he gets higher wages, sometimes as high as $1 per hour. I understand that is what is paid to carpenters and mechanics in some parts of my district. In the country a farm laborer gets $40 per month and his board at 18 years of age. He gets $1,000 a year, house rent, garden, and usually cow and horse keep, if he is a married man and takes the part of a tenant on the farm, supervising and looking after it. There is one legitimate way to bring down the high cost of living so as to make it permanent and uniform, and that is by greater production. The law of supply and demand is the only law that gives stability to prices of commodities. I have had such a large crop of potatoes that I could not give them away. Then everybody had plenty of potatoes and no one wanted them. A few years ago I was in Port Huron and I visited a gentleman with a large orchard in which the trees were loaded with fruit. I suggested to him that he made a nice profit out of his orchard. He stated that he could not give them away. He had announced in the city that everyone was welcome to come and get apples, but no one wanted the apples. There were apples everywhere. The farmer himself is not too much troubled about his wage or the hours he works. A big campaign is being put on now by mechanics and factory workmen for eight hours a day. The coal miners want a six-hour day and half holiday on Saturday. The farmer has an eight-hour day; that is, eight hours in the forenoon and eight hours in the afternoon. His wages depend on the sunshine and rain, and are rendered uncertain by storm, drought, insects, and other elements, the cyclone and hail. The life of a farmer producing crops is not a sinecure. The average yield of wheat for the last 10 years in Michigan was 10 bushels to the acre. It costs the farmer for fertilizer, rent of farm, implements, tools, labor, seed, harvesting, and marketing $24 per acre to raise an acre of wheat in Michigan. Not much profit in that. Rousseau, the French author, writing in 1746, tells that London some day would suffer from famine and food on account of the loss of its agriculture, and I wish to close my remarks by reading a little poem I learned in school many years ago:

Ill fares the land the hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade—
A breath can make them as a breath hath made;
But a bold peasantry, a country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied.

It will be a sad day for the United States when it gives up its agriculture. We should encourage farm production. We should encourage the farmer instead of making his industry hard and unprofitable. We should stop prosecutions against him such as are now being carried on in Ohio and Illinois and aid his pursuit. It is a little lonesome in the country, but much can be done by us to relieve the situation, which will also tend to bring down the cost of living and be beneficial to the welfare of our grand country and Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, on the 8th day of August the President, appearing before a joint session of the Congress, made certain observations and suggestions concerning the high cost of living and the necessity for the immediate passage of some such legislation as this. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture, which framed this bill and which now advocates its passage by a unanimous report, I have given careful consideration to the several suggestions made by the President at that time.

In my judgment the President had two distinct purposes in mind when he delivered that message. In the first place, he wanted to charge the high cost of living up to the failure of the United States Senate to adopt the league of nations and thereby gain support for that instrument. In the second place, he wanted to shift to the less than 3-months-old Republican Congress the responsibility for doing that which the present administration has neglected or refused to do in six years.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may use his 15 minutes in proceeding out of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He is already doing that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank my distinguished friend, Gov. RUBEY, a member of the committee, for his courtesy; but, as the former Speaker of the House said, I guess I was already doing that.

Mr. Chairman, I am a Republican, and always have been. I came to Congress in April, 1917, and was sworn in as a Member of this body only a few days before we declared war against the Imperial German Government. Since the declaration of war, and during the crisis through which our country has just passed, I can truthfully say that I have voted upon all measures without any thought of partisan advantage. I have not engaged in any partisan debate, nor have I sought to embarrass those responsible for the conduct of the war. However, when the President, as I believe, deliberately seeks to shift the burden of the high cost of living from his own shoulders to Congress, because the political complexion of the Congress has recently changed, I do not feel bound or disposed to remain silent.

There is but one inference to be drawn from the President's address, and that is that Congress can lower the cost of living by additional legislation. Nothing is more absurd. If the cost of living can be reduced by legislation, the President can begin the process of lowering it to-day. He is clothed with ample power to prosecute the hoarder, the profiteer, the destroyer of food, as well as those who conspire or combine to boost prices.

If the high cost of living is due to the fact that food products are being destroyed through neglect or otherwise, I call the President's attention to the fact that under section 8 of the food-control act of August 10, 1917—

> Any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years or both.

If the price is controlled by any combination to restrict either supply or distribution, section 9 of the same law provides—

> That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years or both.

If the high cost of living is the result of storing or holding for the purpose of affecting the supply or increasing the price to the consumer, section 26 of the same law provides a penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment for two years or both. This section of the food-control act seems broad enough to reach the owner or operator of a cold-storage plant if he attempts to increase the cost to the consumer of stored products by holding them until the demand creates a higher price.

The President says he wants to reach the profiteer. Let me suggest that the Sherman antitrust law is still on the statute books, although it has recently grown musty from disuse. The Sherman antitrust law will, I am sure, reach any profiteer who seeks to corner any food products for the purpose of increasing the cost to the consumer.

There is no use trying to deceive anybody about this bill. If you expect this measure to make more than a dent in the high cost of living, you may as well look elsewhere for relief. It will not do it. In his message, above referred to, the President said:

> I earnestly recommend that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt.

This bill is presented to the House by the Committee on Agriculture largely in response to that suggestion. The bill in itself is a good one and should be passed, but I can not recommend it as a measure designed to reduce the cost of living. It will, however, serve two very useful purposes. It will give us uniform cold-storage legislation for the country. As a health measure, it should find favor with all who have an earnest desire to protect the public against food unfit for human consumption. Beyond this it will accomplish little.

Cold-storage legislation is practically a new thing. My own State of Indiana and the State of New Jersey are the pioneers in cold-storage legislation. These States passed cold-storage laws in 1911. The Indiana law limits the storage of foods to nine months and provides for the marking of containers with the date of entry into cold storage. A license fee of $10 per year is required for the operation of a cold-storage warehouse. As far as I know, Indiana is the only State that limits the storage of foods to less than 12 months. The New Jersey law first fixed the time limit for storage at 10 months, with longer storage permitted by consent of the State board of health. I am informed that the New Jersey law now fixes a limit at 12 months.

This bill provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce, or hold in cold storage while in interstate commerce, or sell or offer for sale in interstate commerce, or, having received from shipment in interstate commerce, sell or offer for sale in the original unbroken package any article of food which has been in cold storage after the expiration of 12 months following the date on which the article of food was first placed in storage. This seems to be a reasonable provision, and, with the exception of the State of Indiana, which, as stated, has a time limit of nine months, conforms to the limit fixed by the several States which have cold-storage laws. The States now having such cold-storage laws are as follows: North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Iowa, Massachusetts, New York, California, Illinois, New Hampshire, Utah, Maryland, Louisiana, New Jersey, and Indiana.

The point which has been under discussion most during the enactment of the various cold-storage laws has been the limit of time which food products may remain in storage and yet be fit for human consumption. The Bureau of Chemistry, of the Department of Agriculture, has compiled data in support of the proposition that one year is a reasonable storage period. The hearings before our committee also developed this fact. So I presume we can safely accept that period.

I want to say just a word about another suggestion made by the President in connection with this cold-storage legislation. I refer to his suggestion that food products released from storage for interstate shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. The committee did not see fit to incorporate that provision in the bill. In this position I heartily concur. I am glad that an amendment embodying that proposal has already been voted down by the Committee of the Whole. I regard legislation of this character as being very dangerous to the business of the country. I shall not support any legislation embodying this idea. Business wants to be let alone. The business of the country has a right to demand that it be given a rest from Government interference. If we will only give the natural law of supply and demand a chance to function again we will be on a fair way to recovery from the ills that have followed Government ownership and Government regulation.

Mr. Chairman, I do not at this time want to enter into a lengthy discussion of the cause or causes of the present high cost of living, but I do want to make a few simple observations. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, no one seems to want to tell the truth about the high cost of living. Perhaps the causes are too simple to be accepted by those who are looking for high-sounding definitions and deep-seated economic theories. Of course, many things can properly be urged as causes, such as inflation of the currency, which has depreciated the value of the dollar; the almost criminal extravagance of this administration, which has made necessary a burdensome taxation; the continued exportation of necessities for the relief of foreign countries, thus decreasing the supply in the United States; the encumbering of the Government pay roll with thousands of useless employees; the purchase and hoarding by the War Department of vast quantities of food, clothing, and other supplies at exorbitant prices; the politicalization of the railroads, with increased freight and passenger rates; as well as innumerable other acts and tendencies of this administration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have heard it repeated a number of times that the depreciation of the currency is one of the causes of the high cost of living. The gentleman repeats it. I would like to know if he can get hold of a dollar that he can not get a dollar in gold for, the same as he could any day?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes; but you can not get 30 cents' worth of food. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the food that has depreciated.

Mr. PURNELL. To my mind the real causes are lack of production and extravagance. The remedies are more production and greater economy. The plain truth is that the country needs to settle down to work. Until it does, it can never hope to settle up. We need to practice a rigid economy as a nation and as individuals. We need to use more patches and less perfume. [Laughter.] The New York Sun carried a story a few days ago to the effect that a reporter had discovered a patch on my trousers. I know of no class that has been hit harder by the high cost of living than Members of Congress. I undertake to say that unless we get some relief soon there will be a great demand for barrels among a lot of us poor Members of Congress. [Laughter.] I mention this to show that we are vitally interested in this question both as individuals and as representatives of the people.

I am going to make one further suggestion. The President should not only urge more work and more rigid economy but, as the recognized head of the Nation, should set a wholesome example for the country. I shall not criticize him for failure to work, for everybody knows that nothing is quite so tiresome or wearing as continuous travel. [Laughter.] I do think, however, the President has much to learn about economy. As some one said at the other end of the Capitol the other day, he has been "spending money like a drunken sailor." He has disregarded every economy in the expenditure of money. He has cavorted around with royalty and with the representatives of monarchies and spent more money in his travels through the country and about the world than has ever before been expended by any monarch since the beginning of civilization. His expenses at the peace conference will aggregate more than all the expenses put together of all the representatives of this Government at similar conferences since the beginning of the Nation. It will be a shock to the country to know just what it cost to take those sixteen hundred advisers to Europe, whose advice was never accepted. It will be interesting to know just what it cost the people to put a glass roof on the George Washington in order that the presidential party might bask in the sunshine at sea. It will be interesting, at least, to know what it cost to take the musicians out of the fashionable Biltmore Hotel of New York City to play while the President ate the food prepared by the hands of special chefs. The country is anxious to know what it cost to send a special ship in advance to Europe with automobiles to meet the President upon his arrival. About all we know of these expenditures so far is that the President handed one Barney Baruch $150,000 at the peace conference. Of course, in these days of billions that may seem a paltry sum to the President and Mr. Baruch, but nevertheless it would purchase a good many patches for those who have remained at home in seats made doubly anxious by the fact that nothing is more certain than taxes and death. Economy, like charity, should begin at home, and the President should point the way for the Nation. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That if any article of food is mixed or mingled with any other article of food, the dates required by section 3 of this act shall be held to be all the dates of storage of that article of food which has been in storage the longest time, and such resulting mixture or intermingled articles of food shall be so marked, together with the name and location of all warehouses in which any portion of such resulting mixture or intermingled articles of food is or has been stored.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 11, after the word "food," insert "and the resulting mixture is thereafter placed in cold storage."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I beg to say in this connection that if, for example, you put a piece of pork into a can of beans and the beans were held in cold storage for a few days, which they always are as a matter of convenience to preserve them, that this would have to be held as a cold-storage product. It seems to me that the committee has failed to reach the right conception of what this bill is intended to do. We are trying, I assume, to report and enact a bill to reduce the high cost of living by forcing cold-storage products out into the open to be sold to the people within a given period of time.

What have we done? It is proposed to fix a definition of what a cold-storage warehouse is. It says anything that goes into a cold-storage warehouse where the temperature is less than 45 is a cold-storage product. It says anything that goes in is a cold-storage product. Why, this would make it absolutely impossible for you to sell fresh meat anywhere in the United States. The very moment an animal is killed in a packing house it goes into cold storage and must be chilled. The salesroom out of which you are selling fresh meat every day for consumption to the American people and the people of the world is held at a temperature of 38. Every well-regulated butcher shop in every city in the United States carries its fresh meat in cold storage.

Why, under the law proposed here defining cold-storage meats you could not sell fresh meat to the people of the United States. What are you doing to the farmers under this bill? You are compelling them, if they make butter at their creamery, either to keep it out of storage, where they can chill and cool it and make it fit for consumption, for shipment, and for sale, or to sell their products as cold-storage products, because it makes no difference whether it is in there five minutes or five months under the definition provided in this bill it is cold storage. You do not mean that, I am sure.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; and we do not say so, either.

Mr. MADDEN. You do say so. You do not say anything else.

Mr. HAUGEN. All right, go ahead.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what you say:

The term "refrigerator vehicle" includes any car, vessel, or other vehicle, or portion thereof, which is designed and used for the transportation of any article of food at or below the temperature of 45° above zero.

What else do you say?

The term "article of food" includes any article, except liquid food, that is intended or designed as food for human consumption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Make it five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. No; give me 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. The term "article of food" now means and includes any article, except liquid form, which is intended or designed as food for human consumption. What does it mean if that is not what it means? If what I say is not what it means, then I do not understand the definition of the English language.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The gentleman will find a 30-day provision——

Mr. MADDEN. There is no 30-day provision anywhere in the bill except to provide for the removal of the statement that the product is cold storage.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes; that meets that situation and it says that these things shall not be considered cold storage or become cold storage except put there for the purpose of entering into interstate commerce.

Mr. MADDEN. One thing more I wish to say in this connection. Under the provisions of the bill you have reported, why bread would be included, eggs would be included, and all other bakery products that contain butter would be included; lard, eggs, anything that includes any of these ingredients that have been in cold storage. You could not sell it. Now, why do we want to make it impossible for the people of the United States to buy the things which they want while we are pretending to say we want to make these things cheaper for them? Do not you know under the provisions of this bill that you are going to make it cost more, not less? You are going to embarrass, not assist. You are going to embarrass the producer, you are going to embarrass the man who buys and the man who sells. You are going to compel every man who buys or sells to know whether this stuff has been in cold storage or not, and I say to you there ought not to be any ambiguity about the bill. It ought to be clear, it ought to be sane, it ought to be safe, it ought to be possible for one to understand it who is not in the habit of making laws. Under this language if you had mincemeat containing meat, nuts, or fruits, or jams, or jellies, or preserves containing fruit, candy containing butter, eggs, lard, or other shortening or other ingredients, it would be cold storage under the definition.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In connection with section 3, which is the 30-day provision, I am just wondering if that section really does cure the objection the gentleman was suggesting.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, it does not.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The latter part of it seems to provide that a part of the label may be taken off.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; you can take the label off if it has not been in 30 days. I know it provides for that, but why take the label off? Under the law you have got to report it was in cold storage. You are compelled to make a report when it goes in and when it comes out.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The point I am making, if the gentleman pleases, is really you are not entitled to take the label off if it is in there 30 days. You only take the mark "cold storage" off, and you still have the date of the label in there and the name and location of the warehouse.

Mr. MADDEN. And that ought not to be; it is ridiculous; it is outrageous, unjust, and indefensible. Now, if you have pork and beans, as I said before, contained in cans that have been in cold storage, why you have to put a label on. Is there any sense in that? Not a bit.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield just at present, I am sorry. Canned meats, canned fruits, canned vegetables, if you have a product which has been held in cold storage present in minute proportions to the product itself, are never held in storage, as it is nonperishable, and yet you provide that everything that goes into human consumption is subject to the provisions of this bill, and only in the case where the material has not been held for 30 days are you permitted to take that part of the label off which calls it "cold storage," but nevertheless you are required to make a report as to when it went into cold storage and when it comes out and where the storage plant was. Why, all these things add to the cost. They do not reduce the cost of living, and all these things add to the embarrassment.

The uniform cold-storage laws throughout the country provide that fresh meat, fresh-meat products, eggs, chickens, fresh fish, and products of that sort, are the only products subject to cold-storage regulation. Why? Because these are the essential products to be affected by retention in a cold-storage warehouse for a period longer than they should be kept there. But now you cover hickory nuts, hazelnuts, beans, and raisins. Why, you never could look a raisin pie in the face if you passed this bill under the present definition. You could not put an apple in a cold-storage warehouse without labeling the apple as a cold-storage product if you kept it there for more than 30 days. You and I know, and everybody else knows, if it was not for cold storage you would not have the delicacies on your table that you are now permitted to enjoy, except during the period of the year when you could pick the fruits and other things off the trees.

I am in favor of the strictest regulations to the extent that sense and justice can employ the regulations. I am utterly opposed to the definition provided in this bill, and I think it ought to be modified. The amendment I have offered is offered in good faith, with the hope and expectation that the House will see the wisdom of it. It is one of these things which, if adopted, will prevent the idiotic action that will have to be taken to prevent the sale without the marking of a can of Boston beans, with a piece of pork as big as your thumb-nail in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] admits that he has not read section 3——

Mr. MADDEN. No; I did not admit it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan (continuing). That provides the 30-day limit.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If he has not admitted that he has not read it, he has admitted that he does not understand it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not admit either that I did not read it or understand it, but I will say in connection with the statement made by the gentleman, when I did read it, I knew it did not apply to the limitation except to the extent that he could strike a part of the label off.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I was trying to be fair to the gentleman from Illinois, so I suggested that he had not read the section. He says he has read it, but did not understand it. It is very evident, it seems to me and to the committee, that he either had not read it or was speaking without full understanding of its provisions. I think the gentleman will find, if he examines other portions of the bill, that some of the objections he makes will be found to be covered, and that his objections have no force.

Now, as to the mixing and mingling of these articles of food, the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is in line with the suggestion made by his colleague [Mr. WILSON], who offered an amendment Saturday when the bill was under consideration. He offered an amendment to provide that a product made by mixing or mingling foods that had been kept in cold storage should not be marked, and he mentioned sausage. He did not wish to have sausage marked as this bill provides, although made of cold storage meats that had been kept in storage a full year. That would permit meats out of which sausage is to be made to be kept in cold storage for a year, scraps and practically offal, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON] spoke about, to be kept in cold storage a year and then made into sausage, and that sausage would go out without any mark or designation whatever to indicate that the ingredients had been kept in cold storage, and the sausage might be put upon the market and sold as entirely fresh. That would be the result of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON], and the gentleman from Illinois, his colleague [Mr. MADDEN], who has just offered this amendment, evidently wishes to do the same thing.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me for a moment. Now, the gentleman in his illustration as to what would be injuriously affected by this bill, names articles of food that are never under any circumstances put into cold storage.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I deny that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman speaks of beans. They are not put into cold storage. The gentleman speaks of nuts and raisins, and so on. They are not put into cold storage. He mentions bread. It is not put into cold storage.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the gentleman does not want to misstate what I said. I said the bread that had butter in it, that had lard in it, that was in cold storage, would not be permitted to be sold on the market. That is what I said.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course I am wrong if I differ with the Committee on Agriculture. I suppose, but the wisdom of the House is not all centered in the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Well, I do not know whether the Committee on Agriculture is willing to admit that or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think they will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But I know of no action on their part or any demeanor on the part of any members of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, I know of no action on the part of the committee, or any demeanor on the part of any of its members, that would justify the statement of the gentleman.

Now, as to section 5, when food is mixed or mingled with any other article of food, I will take an illustration where a number of cases of eggs are put into cold storage. After they remain a time they are picked over and packed again and part from one container is put in with a part from another container. The containers are thus again filled up. Under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] there would be no marking of those mingled articles. They could go out into commerce without anything to indicate that they had been in cold storage, and if so——

Mr. MADDEN. What about the fresh meats under this law?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was speaking of the mingled articles. I do not wish to be taken away from that.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be willing to express an opinion on the fresh meats as affected by this provision?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not wish to get away at this time from section 5, as to mixed and mingled articles. The gentleman knows, and others know, at least, that the condition of articles of food is changed while they are being kept in cold storage. The food is changed from one container to another, or portions of different containers are mixed or mingled together in one container, and it is necessary if they put in an article of food that has been in six months and mingle it with an article of food that has been in three months—it seems proper at least—that the resulting mixture shall be marked with the date of the mixture that first went into cold storage. If the committee does not agree with us and thinks that the date of that which has been in cold storage the shortest time shall be put on, we leave that to the judgment of the committee. But the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture was that the date should be that of the oldest article that was put into the mixture.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire when this marking is done?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In answer to that I will repeat that in our opinion the goods will usually be marked when they are first put into storage, but the Congress of the United States has no authority to direct that goods shall be marked when they are put in or that they shall be marked at any particular time while they are in cold storage. The Congress can simply determine that these goods shall not be shipped in interstate commerce unless and until they have been marked. That is all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And, as I have said, we think that in the ordinary course of business one operating a cold-storage warehouse and receiving goods for storage, knowing that they are destined for or may enter interstate commerce, will mark those goods when they first go in with the date when they went in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The question is whether they will be marked when they are put in. The gentleman formerly said they would not be marked when they are put into cold storage. That is what I want to understand. I will give you an illustration.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me. I have the gentleman's idea exactly, and the gentleman is taking my time. I say the goods will very likely be marked when they go in.

Further answering the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I will say that the Congress of the United States has no power to require the marking of goods when they go into cold storage, or to require that they shall be marked in any way at any particular time while they are in cold storage. All the authority that Congress has is under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, by which Congress can by law prohibit the shipment of these goods unless they are so marked when shipped or offered for shipment in interstate commerce.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] says that they may be shipped within the States. I make the distinction. They may be shipped within the States. In that case the Federal Government has no authority whatever over them. But the Federal Government has authority if these goods are offered for shipment in interstate commerce, and everywhere in this bill will be found words carrying out that idea. It goes no further than interstate commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the Clerk report it, and then follow it up with the other amendment, so as to make it read as one amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 4, line 7, after the word "food," insert the words "and the resulting mixture is thereafter placed in cold storage."

Mr. MADDEN. That is the old one. Read the first one, and then couple them together.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 4, line 10, after the word "food," insert "placed in cold storage, and within 30 days after being placed therein is mixed or mingled with any other article of food and the resulting mixture is thereafter placed in cold storage, the dates required by section 3 of this act shall be held to be all the dates of storage of that article of food which has been in storage the longest time," etc.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Illinois undertakes to reach a portion of this bill which I think is a little confusing. I think the Committee on Agriculture is to be congratulated upon this bill. I think it is drawn, as everybody knows, under great difficulty. The committee was limited to the constitutional powers granted by the commerce clause. The food laws which we have drawn are under the war powers, of course, and hence they do not involve that trouble. I think there are some provisions of sections 3 and 5 and 6 and 7 that get away from the criterion by which the committee must be guided.

Now, it has been stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN]—and I think he is accurate in his statement—that this legislation could not provide that these cold-storage products must be marked. Yet in the 30-day clause—and this is the thing that is confusing to me—there seems to be an effort on the part of the committee to permit all fresh-meat shipments without having the cold-storage product marked "Cold storage." The committee assumes in section 3 that these cold-storage products are marked when they are put in, which I think is a false assumption. In other words, it makes no difference if a cold-storage company, for instance, are putting their meat into cold storage for a short time or a long time. At the time the meat is put in cold storage there is no necessity, so far as the law is concerned——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As I see it, there is no necessity under this law for such company to label that cold-storage product at all. They could go on for 60 days putting products in cold storage, and then at the end of that time, if they concluded to make an interstate shipment, if the shipment were made on the 1st of October and the product had been put in there on the 1st of August, they would be obliged at that time to comply with the law and put thereon the label stating that it was cold storage, the date on which it had been put in cold storage, and the name of the warehouse. In other words, section 3 does not require the marking of the cold-storage product, and I think properly so; the proviso in section 3 is confusing in assuming that it does so require. Now, I refer to section 3 in order to make clear the point that I am going to make about section 5.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. VOIGT. That proviso does not contemplate that the goods were marked when they went into cold storage, except in the case where they are put into interstate commerce. If the goods remain in the State, they may be withdrawn from cold storage under this bill after a year's time without any marking whatever, but if they are shipped in interstate commerce during the 30-day period, then, of course, the marks must be put on.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They must be put on, but if it is within the 30-day period, must they put on the marks when they are ready to ship out and then tear them off again if they are sold within the 30 days?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes; that is it exactly, if they ship the food in interstate commerce. The committee were constantly confronted with this proposition, that we could not regulate anything except interstate commerce.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. VOIGT. And I will say that this section 3 was carefully considered, and we found no other way out of this difficulty.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think section 3 is entirely clear, but, of course, the committee have passed that, and I am not asking to return to it. The gentleman's explanation is quite satisfactory. But in view of the points made by the gentleman from Illinois, I call attention to section 3 for the purpose of discussing a provision in section 5. I should like the attention of the members of the committee in particular. In line 14 there is this provision. In section 5 is the first provision in this law which apparently requires the marking of the articles of food. The committee seem to have departed from the rule that they could not require the marking of food. Now, this is the provision to which I refer:

And such resulting mixture or intermingled articles of food shall be so marked.

That is an entire departure from the criterion in No. 3 that you could merely provide that they could not be shipped in interstate commerce unless they were marked.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Section 3 of this act only requires them to be marked in case they go out into interstate commerce.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The language in section 5 is:

SEC. 5. That if any article of food is mixed or mingled with any other article of food, the dates required by section 3 of this act shall be held to be all the dates of storage of that article of food which has been in storage the longest time——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That refers only to the date?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And then it says:

And such resulting mixture or intermingled articles of food shall be so marked, together with the name and location of all warehouses in which any portion of such resulting mixture or intermingled articles of food is or has been stored.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is discussing the proposition which I discussed on Saturday. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HAUGEN] insisted on Saturday that the markings had to be affixed at the time the articles went into cold storage. Now I understand the gentleman from Indiana to maintain—and I think he is correct—that there is absolutely nothing in the bill that imposes this requirement.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is my contention; but I also——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We are agreed, then, that it is a mistake to claim that the goods have to be marked, when they go into or are taken out of cold storage?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that I had not noticed that provision until the gentleman commented on it on Saturday. It is very plain, as the gentleman suggests, that there was not any requirement in section 3 that they should be marked. I had not noticed that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If I may be permitted, I want to mention two other sections, because it all relates to one point. In section 6, in lines 20, 21, and 22, it says:

The person who is liable under this act for any failure to have such article of food or the container thereof marked shall mark such subdivision or container in the manner required by section 3.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to this language. And then again, in section 7, it says:

SEC. 7. That if the Secretary of Agriculture finds it to be commercially impracticable to mark any article of food or any container thereof as required by sections 3, 4, 5, or 6, the person who is otherwise liable for the failure to comply therewith shall be held to comply with such sections if he furnishes any person receiving from him such article of food with a written statement or a document conveying or pledging title thereto containing a statement of the facts otherwise required to be marked by such sections.

And so forth.

The point I am making is, in a way, technical, but I think it is an absolutely correct statement that while the committee starts out upon the assumption that it can not require the goods to be marked, and that it can only deal with the articles in cold storage so far as they relate to interstate commerce, in the latter part of section 3 in the proviso and in section 5, the part to which I call attention, and in section 6 and in section 7, the committee depart from that rule and undertake to deal with the question of marking the goods.

It seems to me that these sections ought to be made to conform to the general proposition which the committee has recognized, that you can only deal with interstate and foreign commerce. I think if that were done the gentleman from Illinois would not be trying to make this amendment, because when there is no requirement that goods put in temporary storage shall be marked, if the requirement is that they can not be shipped in interstate commerce unless marked, it would obviate his objection. I think these sections can be slightly changed so as to cover that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. What is there in section 7?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is not quite so plain:

That if the Secretary of Agriculture finds it to be commercially impracticable to mark any article of food or any container thereof as required by sections 3, 4, 5, or 6, the person who is otherwise liable for the failure to comply therewith shall be held to comply with such sections if he furnishes any person receiving from him such article of food with a written statement or a document conveying or pledging title thereto containing a statement of the facts otherwise required to be marked by such sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. He is making a very interesting speech and I want to ask him what the effect this legislation would have on fresh meat.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can not agree upon some time to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 35 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 35 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no mistake I ask that that time be allotted to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], and myself five minutes each.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I did not intend to make such an extended argument. I want my position to be clear. I think the committee has clearly recognized the constitutional limit, and it seems to me that, having in mind that they really do want the goods marked, in subsequent sections, at the latter part of section 3, they have departed unintentionally from the hard-and-fast rule that they can not require them to be marked. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is dealing with a proposition that naturally occurs to everyone. Are we going to require every person who will put beef in cold storage even for a few days, regardless of the purpose, to mark those goods at the time they are put in, and ought we not to make some exceptions?

Mr. MADDEN. You have got to mark fresh meat as "cold storage."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If I were answering the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois about what the effect of the provisions are with regard to beef I would say that so far as the valid provision is concerned it would not cover a person who puts fresh meat in cold storage for a few weeks. I think the gentleman would have no objection to the bill if the bill had followed the straight line, that you can only deal with interstate commerce, because suppose you have a period of 30 days, they might think that some of their goods might be for domestic use, some for shipping within the State, and they would not brand all of this; but when they wanted to ship 10 cases of it, 10 shoulders or 10 hams, when they took it out of cold storage, in order to prevent a person violating the law by shipping it they would then mark it.

I have not my amendment specifically in mind to accomplish that purpose, but it occurs to me that the sections ought to be so framed as to make it clear that Congress does not undertake to compel the marking of cold-storage goods.

There is an additional reason why this section ought to be so framed. If the courts construe this law as requiring the marking of cold-storage goods, and it should be held unconstitutional, all this legislation would be in vain. There are so many sections in it I think it might vitiate the entire law by leaving the sections in such shape, failing to specify, as far as the English language can do it, how and when the goods are to be marked. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I have read with considerable interest the discussion of this question as to when the marking should be done in the debate that was carried on Saturday by the gentleman from Virginia, Judge SAUNDERS, and the chairman of the committee. I read it carefully, and, after listening to what has been said this morning, I am still unsettled as to when the marking shall be done on these cold-storage goods.

It is stated that it will not affect some States. States like Illinois, possibly Michigan, where they have slaughtering and packing houses and a cold-storage plant; also cities like Buffalo, New York; and other States, where they kill the animals and immediately put them in the chilling room.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me that it is written as plain as language can make it so that anybody can fully understand. It says that it shall be unlawful to do what? To ship these goods in interstate commerce. Congress has no jurisdiction as long as the goods are in intrastate commerce, but when it enters into interstate commerce that is a different proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But that does not say that the goods shall be marked when put into cold storage for chilling or assembling or marked when taken out of the chilling room of the warehouse or cold-storage plant for the purpose of shipment in interstate commerce.

Mr. HAUGEN. Whenever they are offered in commerce they have to be marked.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know. But no one can understand the phrase "offered in commerce," as I understood the chairman. Take the case of Chicago. If you kill those cattle and put them into the cold storage, you can keep them for 30 days without marking, but if you take them out of this cold storage within 30 days or after and ship them in interstate commerce to another State, at the time they are taken out and put into interstate commerce or shipped, then they must be marked and the date they were taken into the cold-storage plant. I understand they need not mark them when they are put into cold storage, but they must be marked when taken out for shipment in interstate commerce, and the tag removed if taken out within 30 days to sell to a consumer.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is interested, he says, in the time in which this marking shall be impressed upon the package?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the point.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Now, the chairman of the committee on Saturday said that the marking had to be impressed upon the packages at the moment they went into cold storage.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood so.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Here is what the gentleman said in this connection. I asked: "Does this section contemplate that these inscriptions shall be put upon each separate article as soon as it is put into cold storage?" and the gentleman replied, "Exactly."

Mr. HAUGEN. I had reference to cold storage in commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is not the question I asked, because I assumed——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I refuse to yield further.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I assume they would be marked when they would go into interstate commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I take it that these animals can be killed and put into cold storage, and I assume they can be left there 30 days without marking or without date or stamp, but they must be stamped when taken out of cold storage and shipped to some other State. I understand that then they must be marked at the time that they are taken out for interstate commerce. If that is not true, then I am wrong in my assumption. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would clear that up, and it ought to be adopted, so that we will know that they can stay in these cold-storage plants for curing. Now, suppose they have a cold-storage plant in Georgia. Suppose they have not got one in Florida and they want to ship into Florida. Say they are killed in Georgia, put in the cold-storage plant, and afterwards put in refrigerator cars and sent down to Florida. Now, at the time they are sent, at the time they are shipped, it is perfectly proper to stamp the date on them when put into cold storage and mark them "cold storage." There ought to be a system of marking them only as put into commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the arrangement the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am sorry there are so few members of the committee here. I think really we ought to have on an important question like this a very large attendance, but I propose now an amendment which would make section 5 read like this:

That if any article of food placed in cold storage and within 30 days after being placed therein is mixed or mingled with any other article of food and the result of the mixture is thereafter placed in cold storage, the dates required by section 3 of this act shall be held to be the dates of storage of that article of food which has been in storage the longest time.

Now, my proposition is that the required marking shall not be compulsory unless the material has been in cold storage for 30 days. Under the reading of the pending bill it would be compulsory on every packer in the United States and every creamery in the United States to mark the date of entry into storage of every pound of butter, every pound of meat, and the date of release from storage, even if it was there only 24 hours, and so you put the fresh-meat products of the United States and the fresh-butter products of the United States in the cold-storage category. That is what you do. Now, I want to ask whether you men on the Committee on Agriculture can afford to go before the farmers of America and tell them that the cattle they raise and the hogs they raise and the butter they make—that when the cattle and hogs are shipped for slaughter they must be by law classed as cold-storage products? Why, you will reduce the value of every steer one-half. The mere statement of the case that it has gone into cold storage will reduce the value to the farmer of every hog that he raises, of every steer that he raises, of every pound of butter that he makes. Is that what you want? If it is, all right. If those who are now trying to reduce the cost of living want to do that, all right. Go before the country and say so. If you want to take the living out of the mouth of the farmer, who works before the sun rises and long after it sets every day, who has no eight-hour day, who toils in season and out of season, in the rain and in the storm, who takes his chances with the elements for the success of his crops, who has no means by which he can guarantee the success of his work but must depend upon the acts of God—now comes in the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, made up almost wholly of farmers, and they say to the farmers of America, "No longer have you any place in the life of this great country." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois, who is concerned so much about the farmers——

Mr. MADDEN. I am a farmer myself.

Mr. HAUGEN. Suggests including under the law everything that the farmer puts in cold storage and excluding everything the packer puts in cold storage. He would exclude oleomargarine and would include butter. Butter would have to be marked with the date it enters into cold storage. Oleomargarine, when mixed with something else, would be excluded. That is the gentleman's interest in the farmer. Gentlemen, it is a strange thing to say that the bill was drafted largely at the suggestion of the cold-storage people and the packers. It appears that everybody wants some cold-storage legislation, but everybody wants his products excluded from the cold-storage marking. That is the situation. We first drafted the bill excluding everything from the marking for 30 days. On came the cold-storage people saying that that would not do; that we should mark everything, but that we should permit the removing of the marks if kept for less than 30 days. So the draft of the bill was changed, and it now comes in the form provided here.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did I understand the gentleman from Iowa to say that it met the approval of the cold-storage people?

Mr. HAUGEN. It does largely, so far as I know. Of course, there are some exceptions. It is impossible to draft a bill that meets with the approval of everybody. I will give the gentleman an illustration. I asked some witnesses, "Do you want to come in under this bill?" They said, first, that they thought not. The next day they wanted to come in. I do not know whether to-day they want to or not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman say that this bill, whose purpose must be to regulate and control an industry, and which is drawn according to the wishes of that industry, will do very much good to the general public?

Mr. HAUGEN. This is not drawn in favor of any special interest. We treat everybody alike. The contention is that now, without Federal legislation, you can keep an article in cold storage in one State 12 months, then remove it to another State and there keep it in cold storage for another 12 months, and so on indefinitely. The proposition here is that everything shall be unloaded every 12 months. That is the purpose of the bill. The marking is evidence as to how long it has been in cold storage. The only way by which you can check up is by marking everything. If you exempt them from marking for 30 days, the goods could be stored for 29 days in a cold-storage warehouse and then moved on to another, an endless chain. If so, you might as well not have any cold-storage law. The only way to keep a check on these articles is to mark them when they go in or when offered in interstate commerce, and if they have not been in cold storage 30 days then remove the mark of cold storage. That seems to meet the approval of all, including the cold-storage people. There are some objections to this bill. No bill was ever drafted that did not have some objections to it. It is not possible to draft a bill that will meet the views of everybody in every detail. You mention the hight cost of living. It is not so much the purpose of this bill to reduce the high cost of living as it is to protect the people, and the consumer in particular, against unwholesome food.

The gentleman has spoken about the expense attached. Of course there is expense. There is some expense attached to the enforcement of every law. It is necessary to pass laws to give protection to the people. You can not enforce any law without incurring some expense. Certain expense is incurred here. The bill carries a $50,000 appropriation. In addition, of course, expense will be incurred by the cold-storage people, but little objection is made to that by them. They have already agreed that we have the right to check up their books to see how they are kept and also examine their plants as to sanitary conditions. Practically every portion of the bill has been agreed to. I know of no serious objection to it in any particular from any source.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there seems still to be some confusion as to the real meaning of this bill. That confusion is apparently shared by some of the members of the committee with respect to the requirements of the bill on the subject of markings. I desire to make a statement as to what I conceive to be the meaning and effect of this bill in this particular. As I understand this measure there is no requirement or obligation on the part of the warehouseman, when goods are stored in his warehouse, to see that they are marked as to the dates of entry, or withdrawal. Hence, when I put goods in a cold-storage warehouse, I can withdraw those goods without marking same, whatever I may have in mind as to their ultimate disposition. I do not have to make to the warehouseman, with respect to my goods, any statement as to my intentions, nor are there any provisions in this bill that compel me to mark my goods when withdrawn with the words "cold storages" or any other notation. If this be true, and inevitably it is true under the terms of the bill, then a very great opportunity for fraud is afforded.

Take an illustration: I put 50 crates of eggs in cold storage, and permit them to stay in cold storage for two, three, or four months, as the case may be. Then I withdraw them. When they are withdrawn, they will not be marked "cold storage" or otherwise. Suppose I mingle these eggs with eggs of a later date, and put them in the aggregate into interstate commerce, and ultimately sell them. How will the Government detect the fraud? Of course I concede that upon the state of facts supposed, the goods should be marked before shipment. But if I ship them without marks, how will the offense be brought home to me, save with the utmost difficulty? Once the goods are withdrawn without marks, mingled with other goods, and shipped in interstate commerce, the Government will experience great difficulty in tracing them.

Hence I say that this law offers a dealer an opportunity to commit fraud, with very little likelihood that the Government will overtake him and bring him to justice.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman understands the restriction imposed upon this body to pass a law that would compel the marking of these goods unless they entered interstate commerce?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have so contended. The committee, however, or some at least of its members, have undertaken to claim that this measure requires the goods to be marked before they are withdrawn from the warehouse. This contention in my judgment is not well founded.

Mr. TINCHER. I think that understanding on the gentleman's part was due to a misunderstanding between him and the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will ask the gentleman from Kansas if the goods must be marked at the time of lodgment or withdrawal.

Mr. TINCHER. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I can withdraw them without marking them?

Mr. TINCHER. Not if you put them in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is a subsequent operation.

Mr. TINCHER. That has been the understanding.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That has not been the understanding of the House. It has been contended that if I withdraw my goods for interstate commerce, I must mark them at the time of withdrawal. Such is not the case. The requirement as to marking only arises when I propose to put the goods into interstate commerce.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he does not think the language of section 5 departs from that rule and indicates that the committee had in mind that requirement?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If you will examine the bill and the arguments that were made on Saturday you will see that the committee had in mind that the goods should be marked on withdrawal.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think that is illogical and ought to be corrected?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was not the committee confronted with the constitutional barrier that would prevent them from requiring the owner, until he went into interstate commerce, to put on the mark?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That may be true; but the committee should make clear the real meaning of the bill, and not use language which carries, by implication, another meaning.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are some amendments proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and a suggested amendment by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. The gentleman from Illinois is very much dissatisfied with the measure and pronounces it vicious and arrogant. I will not attempt to give the different names that he applies to the bill. It is perhaps unfortunate in this House that we find in the Committee on Agriculture only three Members from the State of Illinois, and that the distinguished gentleman who offers these amendments is so busy with other duties that he is unable to act as the fourth Member from that State on this committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. No; I can not yield. If the gentleman had spent time in reading the hearings on this bill instead of preparing a set speech about raisin pie and Boston baked beans, that never go into cold storage, he would have a clearer understanding of the bill as reported by the committee than he seems to have at present. I do not believe that any such amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted by this House, and I do not think that the farmers of the United States are going to be carried off their feet by his apprehensions in their behalf. There is no doubt but that a great section of the city of Chicago can be greatly exercised over the welfare of the poor farmer on very little provocation, but I say to the gentleman that they had fair hearings, and the packers from his city had fair hearings, and the producers had fair hearings, and the cold-storage men had fair hearings, and they comprised about a thousand pages of the hearings of this committee on the bill.

Now, as to Indiana, we are restricted to one gentleman on the committee from that State. In addition to his legal advice we were confined in our hearings to only the benefit of the counsel of the Department of Agriculture and the Attorney General's office of the United States, so that if our legal expressions are not understood it is due perhaps to the fact that other gentlemen were busy on other committees and could not give us much of their time. [Laughter.] But if you will permit every man in this House to change this bill according to his own whims and ideas you will have some job on your hands. The committee sat for weeks and gave this bill their careful consideration. I believe the bill is constitutional, and in that belief I think I have the opinion of the other members of the committee. I am answering the arguments and attacks that have been made on the bill on the floor of the House.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask the gentleman if he was going to follow this very able argument with a motion to abolish the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. TINCHER. No. But I do not think the bill should be amended by the Committee of the Whole on mere declarations to the effect that the bill is ill considered or on finding general fault with the bill. For that reason I do not think the amendment should be adopted. There has been no legitimate objection offered to the bill by the gentleman from Illinois. I can assure him that he can still have his raisin pie and baked beans, which do not go into cold storage.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand they do go into cold storage.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to make a speech, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], who has just taken his seat, has practically said what I intended to say.

I listened very carefully to the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I have listened to him a great many times upon this floor, and especially have I followed him in the discussion of one particular measure, the Post Office appropriation bill, because I knew that he had given careful and candid consideration to everything in that measure. I listened attentively to what he said a few moments ago on this bill, and there is absolutely no ground at all for the fault that he has found with this measure. There is not a thing in this bill at all which calls for the criticism that he has made upon the measure, and when he gets through here and goes back to his office and sits down and reads the bill carefully from beginning to end and studies everything in it he will find out that he has simply gotten up here and made a speech based upon something that he did not know anything about.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUBEY. No. Wait until I get through. Then I will yield. I do not want to be drawn away from my line of argument.

Mr. MADDEN. You are not making an argument.

Mr. RUBEY. I am making about the same sort of argument that the gentleman from Illinois made when he asked a little later in his speech, referring to a proposition, "When did that get in there?" which absolutely shows that he did not know what was in the bill; that he did not know that that provision was in the bill at all.

He talks about the retail business and about fresh-meat products and all that sort of thing, and yet when you examine the sections of the bill you find that in the definition of a warehouseman we exempted specifically the refrigerators, ice boxes, and things of that sort that are in the retail man's place of business. It does not apply to the retailer at all. The gentleman talks about fresh meats going into cold storage. I wonder if the gentleman from Illinois has read the law of the State of Illinois on the subject of cold storage? That law specifically requires that fresh meat may go into cold storage, and it sets forth how long it shall stay there. That is a State law, and every person in the State of Illinois is governed by that law.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. No; not now.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says I do not know anything about it. How does the gentleman know I do not know anything about it.

Mr. RUBEY. I judged so by the gentleman's speech.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman has no business to draw such an inference.

Mr. RUBEY. That is the only way I can judge of the knowledge that the gentleman has upon a particular measure—by the things he says about it; and when he says there are things in the measure which are not in it, then I think he does not know about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. Now I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to let the gentleman know that all meats immediately upon slaughtering go into cold storage at a temperature of 38°, and the retailer, when he puts his meat on sale, takes it out of a cold-storage room. What are you going to say about that?

Mr. RUBEY. I want to say to the gentleman that there is not a thing in this bill which applies to anything except those things which go into interstate commerce—not one thing. This whole bill is based upon interstate commerce, and until an article goes into interstate commerce the provisions of this bill do not apply at all. That is the reason that the statement made by the gentleman is not applicable here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 3, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 4, line 11, strike out the words "required by" and insert in lieu thereof the words "mentioned in."

Also strike out lines 14 and 15 and the word "of," in line 16, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And the warehouses mentioned in section 3 shall include."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Has debate been closed on this, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 10, noes 18.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer another amendment. I move to strike out, on page 4, in line 15, all after the word "marked," down to and including the word "stored" in line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 4, line 15, strike out, after the word "marked," the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I make the point of order that where there are no votes whatever in the affirmative the gentleman is not entitled to have a division, when he did not even vote for his own amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to a division if he demands it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 18.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to have it noted that there are only 19 Members present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That if the Secretary of Agriculture finds it to be commercially impracticable to mark any article of food or any container thereof as required by sections 3, 4, 5, or 6, the person who is otherwise liable for the failure to comply therewith shall be held to comply with such sections if he furnishes any person receiving from him such article of food with a written statement or a document conveying or pledging title thereto containing a statement of the facts otherwise required to be marked by such sections, to be made in such form and preserved for such time as the Secretary of Agriculture may by regulation prescribe, nor shall any person make any false or fraudulent statement or document authorized or required under this section.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman of the committee what sort of food this particular section would cover.

Mr. HAUGEN. All food that enters into cold storage which is commercially impracticable to mark, and that question is left to the Secretary of Agriculture to determine. This section applies to whatever the Secretary finds is impracticable to mark.

Mr. PELL. And then he makes all the rules as to how it shall be done?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. PELL. And has complete control over that question—to decide it in every case?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. PELL. That practically leaves the administration and interpretation of the bill, and the power to amend or wreck the bill, in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture if he wants to.

Mr. HAUGEN. To a certain extent it is discretionary with the Secretary. The gentleman will understand that there are certain articles of food which it would be impracticable to mark; for instance, cabbages shipped in bulk. It would be impracticable to mark each cabbage head, so it is left to the Secretary to prescribe how they shall be marked.

Mr. CANNON. Or goose eggs.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; goose eggs or hen eggs, individually.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Do I understand that this applies only to articles in the original package which it would be commercially impracticable to have labeled, and that when they are sold the Secretary of Agriculture shall furnish a statement which contains the information that would be on the label?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming that a shipment of fish was brought into a cold-storage house, sold to a wholesaler, and because it is impracticable to put a label on the fish the cold-storage man gives the written statement. Suppose the wholesaler sells the fish to a retailer, does the wholesaler have to furnish a written statement to the retailer and then the retailer in selling them to the consumer have to furnish a written statement to the consumer?

Mr. HAUGEN. By that time they would likely be out of interstate commerce and out of our control. We have control only so long as they remain in interstate commerce or in the original, unbroken package.

Mr. WALSH. What is the original unbroken package in a catch of fish?

Mr. HAUGEN. I suppose they would be frozen.

Mr. WALSH. Frozen in cold storage. My purpose in asking the question is to find out how the consumer would ascertain that the fish was a cold-storage product.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not think the consumer will get much information under this provision, because the goods are going to get out of interstate commerce. Our powers are limited. To be candid, the bill does not amount to much unless the States take it up and follow it. We did everything within our power to do.

Mr. WALSH. If the fish are brought into cold storage, transferred to the wholesaler, and from the wholesaler to the retailer, the retailer to the consumer, would the written statement have to accompany the shipment?

Mr. HAUGEN. If they are in interstate commerce or if the original package has not been broken. After they leave interstate commerce Federal control over them is gone.

Mr. WALSH. When it leaves interstate commerce it is out of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is my understanding.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit, this section provides how goods of different kinds shall be marked. If the committee had known, or could have anticipated all the conditions that might arise, and had the wisdom to know how to meet them, it would have written them into the bill. It is on account of the difficulties of marking, how they should be marked, when they should be marked, that the committee found it necessary to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to make regulations.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate the difficulty of writing those provisions in the bill to cover every case. But I wondered how far the provisions in this bill followed the articles after the statement had been furnished by the person that was required to furnish it when they were put into cold storage, whether if the goods still continued in interstate commerce the written statement still was required to accompany the shipment of goods.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. As a general proposition the statement would have to follow the goods while in interstate commerce. The authority of the Federal Government ceases while they are in interstate commerce, and if there is any such thing as an original package the authority of the Federal Government continues.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will yield, my understanding is that when the goods leave interstate commerce and when they leave the original package the authority of the Federal Government ceases. We follow them as long as they remain in the original unbroken package. There are a number of decisions along this line.

Mr. WALSH. I am endeavoring to get some information. The application of the law to the fishing industry will be of some importance. Assuming the goods are put in cold storage when first brought in, then into interstate commerce, again into cold storage in some other State than that in which they were originally entered into cold storage, do they again have to mark the goods?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will admit that there may be a way found to evade the law.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming a shipment of eggs from Iowa, which is a great State for producing eggs——

Mr. HAUGEN. The best eggs in the world.

Mr. WALSH. They go from Iowa to Texas. In Texas the lot is subdivided and goes to Arizona and put into cold storage there. The second time they go into cold storage would they have to be rebranded and re-marked?

Mr. HAUGEN. If A sells to B in another State, then B sells to C in the same State, C may remove them from the original package; in that way they can evade the law.

Mr. WALSH. Even though he puts them into another package and puts them into another cold-storage house?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; the law is then of no avail when the goods are out of interstate commerce unless the States follow it. The committee went just as far as it could go.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment of Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, to come in at the end of the section:

"But packages withdrawn from a cold-storage warehouse are not required to be marked cold storage or otherwise until they are offered to be shipped or delivered, to be shipped in interstate commerce, or sold, or offered for sale in commerce."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up the time of the committee to elaborate the meaning of this amendment.

It presents in concrete form what I understand is conceded now to be the real meaning and intent of the bill and makes it conform to the requirements of the Constitution which affords us our sole authority to enact this law.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman have reference to anything stored in interstate commerce? I did not catch the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The amendment is to this effect, namely, a declaration that when a man withdraws his goods from cold storage there is no requirement that they shall be marked. Later, if he desires to ship them in interstate commerce, or deliver them to be shipped in interstate commerce, or sell them in interstate commerce, the markings must be affixed.

Mr. HAUGEN. And if they are in interstate commerce, then what?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If they are in interstate commerce, of course the law would apply.

Mr. HAUGEN. Should not the gentleman state "intrastate commerce"? The gentleman would not want to exclude them in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It does not. The amendment says that the moment the goods are offered or delivered for interstate commerce they must be marked as this bill requires. In other words, so far as the warehouse is concerned, I may withdraw my goods without any marks, or statement of my intentions.

Mr. HAUGEN. As long as they are not in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Of course.

Mr. KNUTSON. How are these packages to be marked when they are taken out of cold storage?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The law provides that if they go into interstate commerce, after they are removed, they must before shipment be marked in an indicated way, as "cold storage," with the date on which they were taken into the warehouse.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I did not catch the full meaning of the gentleman's amendment, and here is the point I have in mind. Take a given case, say, in the District of Columbia. I deposit a lot of goods. This law is in operation. I may or may not hereafter want to put those goods in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Do I go down just before—these goods have not been marked, as I understand, under the gentleman's amendment——

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Under the law they are not required to be marked.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. We have another provision in the law which reaches the point I am now making. The idea is that when they are going into interstate commerce, then the marking must be mandatory, and dates back to the date that these goods went into cold storage.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That ought to be cared for.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I agree that these requirements may be, and are, imposed by this bill. On that point I raise no question.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is the only point.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman makes his amendment so as to make it clear it does not apply to anything in interstate commerce, there is no serious objection, because that makes it what it is intended; but I am quite sure the law is clear as it is written. There is no requirement now to mark anything that is not in interstate commerce; but as to anything that is offered for interstate commerce or offered for sale in interstate commerce, or stored in interstate commerce, it has to be marked as required.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is precisely my amendment. I will ask to have it read again.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am sure the gentleman's amendment is not clear. If the gentleman will amend his amendment so as to make it entirely clear I have no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I agree with the chairman of the committee in his statement as to the meaning of the bill, but I do not agree that my amendment is not clear.

Mr. PURNELL. Do I understand the gentleman's amendment to provide that goods taken out of storage in any state shall be then marked?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; they are not required to be marked at the time of removal, but they must be marked when they go into interstate commerce.

Mr. PURNELL. I do not understand this bill provides they shall be marked unless they go in interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We debated that contention last Saturday and a part of to-day.

Mr. PURNELL. Of course, we would have no power to mark unless they went into interstate commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then the gentleman can have no objection to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will ask for one more minute.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Can we have the amendment again reported?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I was going to say to the chairman of the committee in view of the statement he has just made to let me withdraw this amendment, and later I will go over it with him and his associates.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass the section for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to pass the section for the present. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, while we are speaking on this particular matter——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer a motion?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. We have passed the section.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. All right, read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That, except as otherwise permitted by this act, no person shall alter, mutilate, destroy, obscure, obliterate, or remove any mark placed in compliance with this act upon any article of food or the container thereof, while such article is in commerce or having been transported in commerce remains unsold or in the original, unbroken package.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In relation to the matter the gentleman from Virginia was speaking about it seems to be clear to all that the Federal Government has no authority over these things while they are in storage. There can be no provision of Federal law enforced that would require those things to be marked while they are in storage; authority of the Government begins when those goods are taken out and offered for sale or shipment in interstate commerce. When they get into commerce in some way the authority of the Government begins, and a law may be framed that will forbid the shipment of those goods, forbid them going into commerce in any way or even making a start unless the law and its regulations have been complied with.

Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was citing a case of goods in a cold-storage warehouse, and that the owner was not required to mark them while they were there. He is right. He might take them out of the warehouse without being required to mark them. That is right. Then where does the Government catch them? Where does the law passed by Congress catch him or the goods?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion or question right there?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It seemed to me in hearing the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia—I do not know what the legal effect might be—that by some possibility, if that was a positive clause in this law, it would repeal any State law which might require marking, or something of that sort. In other words, the law as the committee has framed it can apply to interstate shipment. If you put this positive provision that the goods shall not be marked, and so forth, or, when taken out of the warehouse, shall not be marked until started in interstate commerce, you might be enacting something contrary to certain State statutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I was not speaking particularly of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. I was speaking to the general proposition he advanced and to the questions he asked.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there? What is the gentleman's opinion as to whether such a provision in this law might have any effect upon the State law?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It might be in contravention of a State law in regard to cold storage and the marking of goods. The Congress ought not to enact such a law.

Now, if the Federal Government has no authority over the goods and can not require their marking while they are in the storehouses or when they are taken out, it can exercise no authority until they enter commerce or are offered for commerce. How do we attempt to take care of that? How do we describe when the Government takes hold? In section 3 it says:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person to ship, or deliver for shipment in commerce, or hold in cold storage while in commerce, or sell or offer for sale in commerce, or having received from shipment in commerce, sell or offer for sale in the original, unbroken package, any article of food that is or has been in cold storage, unless such article of food or container thereof is plainly and conspicuously marked in accordance with this act—

And so forth. If you can think of any other words by which Congress can take hold of those goods earlier than it can under those words, please suggest them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Michigan have three minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it five.

Mr. WALSH. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There is no question but the Federal Government can not touch them or regulate them in any way while they are in the storehouse, nor can the Federal Government prevent their removal from the house. But the moment the goods take on an interstate character, then the authority of the Government attaches. Now, what is that moment? Is there some intermission when they are really in commerce not described by the words used in section 3? If there is that moment, and it can be set forth in words, suggest them, and it may be proper—I can not speak for the chairman of the committee—to put them in this section. But the intention of this section is to catch those goods the very moment they get out of the warehouse—at the very first moment when they are in any respect under the control of the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause—and the words in section 3 are intended to meet the situation.

Mr. BOX. If the goods have been withdrawn and sold in intrastate commerce and then pass immediately by a second sale into interstate commerce, is there anything that will reach them in such a case as that?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not know. I suppose there are ways of passing them through intrastate commerce and avoiding the provisions in this law. I do not say there will not be, but there may be some way of the Government requiring that they shall be marked. Although there is a provision in this bill which describes commerce as "between points in the same State, but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign nation," perhaps that definition of "commerce" is broad enough to cover the situation or the movement the gentleman speaks of.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 175. Joint resolution to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917;

H. J. Res. 211. Joint resolution tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces;

H. R. 6410. An act authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands; and

H. R. 7709. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building.

COLD-STORAGE BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is recognized.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was very much amused this morning when the chairman of the committee, in reply to an interrogatory propounded by me, stated that this legislation met the wishes and views of the cold-storage people. That suggestion is no doubt in line with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] the other day, in discussing the tariff, when he said on the floor that when the Republican Party desired to amend the tariff on dyestuffs they called in the dyestuff manufacturers and drew a bill after conferring with them. And so all along down the line, as to tariff legislation on other articles.

Now, it seems to me that this bill, if it is drawn for the purpose of meeting the wishes of the refrigerator people, has been very skillfully drawn, indeed. In the report of the committee a resolution passed by the cold-storage people appears. I want to call the attention of the committee to one of the reasons why the cold-storage people desire this law enacted. Among other things, the resolution says:

> In order to relieve the industry from the unnecessary annoyances and losses incidental to divergent State laws.

Now, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this law, so far as it affects the consumer, the man who goes up to the counter in the meat market or grocery store and buys an article of food for the consumption of his family, does him no benefit whatever, simply because whenever the article leaves the original package in the hands of the wholesaler or in the hands of the retailer, this bill is no longer effective. And if a retailer buys an article in interstate commerce from a wholesaler, and places the original package in his store, there is nothing on earth to prevent that retailer from taking the articles out of the original package and selling them to the consumer, and the consumer has no knowledge whatever as to whether an article was ever in cold storage or, if it was in cold storage, he has no knowledge as to how long it remained in cold storage.

Mr. VOIGT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VOIGT. The committee was well aware of that fact, and I want to say that there is no way to remedy it.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure.

Mr. VOIGT. Congress loses jurisdiction over goods shipped in interstate commerce the moment they are mingled with the goods of a particular State.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that.

Mr. VOIGT. So there is no way Congress can remedy the difficulty the gentleman complains about?

Mr. CONNALLY. And that is one of the complaints I have as to the action of the committee. You are undertaking to do something that you know you can not do, and you are trying to make the people of the country believe you are going to lower the cost of living by this legislation, when anybody that studies the legislation knows that it is not possible to do so under this bill.

Members of the committee stated on the floor of this House that if anybody expected this bill to in any wise reduce the cost of living, they might as well become disillusionized, and they frankly stated to the members of this committee that, on the other hand, the bill will result in the enhancement of the price of articles. That is true.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Does not the gentleman know that the President of the United States is the only person who ever intimated or maintained that this bill would reduce the high cost of living?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, the gentleman from Kansas is always taking some occasion to take a fling at the President of the United States. If he does not think that anything that the President of the United States says is wise or sound, why does not the gentleman come in and recommend something that would be effective?

Mr. TINCHER. This is a good measure, designed to stabilize and regulate the business.

Mr. CONNALLY. "Stabilize." That word "stabilize," gentlemen of the House, does not mean anything on earth except that the people engaged in an industry always want to stabilize that industry for their own benefit. The bill which the gentleman from Kansas sponsors on the floor of this House will not hurt the packers. The gentleman is always talking about the packers and the farmers. The chief product of the packers is beef. The market man receives a shipment of beef. He knows when it was put in cold storage, because it was marked when it entered cold storage and entered commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Now, that beef is not sold in the original package. The consumer does not buy a hind quarter of beef. What does he buy? He buys a little thin slice on one side. The dealer is under no obligation to tell him when the article went into cold storage. The consumer has to take the meat just as it comes to him, without any information as to its storage. So that will not hurt the packer. But every little farmer who lives out in the district represented by the gentleman from Kansas, when he wants to ship some product of the farm to Missouri or Iowa, when that food product is put into a refrigerator car that little farmer will have to be careful that the article of food is stamped and marked as to when it went into cold storage, and that farmer will have to keep account, under the supervision and jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, as to when and how that product was handled and how often it was moved, and as to how many warehouses it entered, and in how many warehouses it remained. Every time you add to the overhead expense of the people engaged in the interstate shipment of products you are adding to the price that the consumer pays. Do you not know that all the additional bookkeeping the bill requires will add to the cost which the man who buys must pay?

But this bill has another objectionable feature. It invests the Secretary of Agriculture with the right to appoint an army of understrappers, clerks, and inspectors to go out over the country and draw salaries out of the Federal Treasury. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] a day or two ago, in discussing this bill, said he for one was anxious that the Government should take its hands off business and get rid of the Government supervision over all business. And yet, instead of removing these restrictions which have nettled the country, the gentleman from Michigan comes in and champions this bill. About the only good you are going to accomplish by this measure is to interfere with the State laws on cold storage and refrigeration, and you are going to add to the army of tax eaters here in the Department of Agriculture to go around the country at Government expense. The cold-storage people frankly state that they desire to be rid of State laws.

As to the man who actually eats the food, you are not doing anything for his benefit, because he will never know that these articles entered cold storage.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that if we have to go to the expense of putting on the date when the article goes into cold storage and when it comes out of cold storage, and seeing after the brand, it will add to the overhead charges and that extra expense is passed on to the consumer?

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure. The committee is guilty of practicing an absolute fraud and deception on the people. What do they say in this bill? They say they are going to require every cold-storage warehouse to stamp on the container the date when the goods went in, and that they shall not be allowed to remain in cold storage for more than one year. What do they say in the next place? They say—

Provided, however, That if it remains there only 30 days they may be permitted to remove the mark.

Why do you provide that the parties may be permitted to remove the mark if they are to be required to put on the mark? Why not let the stamp remain? It will not cost anything to let it remain. It will not do any harm to let it remain, so that the purchaser may know that the article was in cold storage for 30 days. But if you permit them to remove the mark you offer an opportunity for fraud, because the party could remove the stamp and mix that article with other articles, and thereby perpetrate a fraud on the people of the country.

If this bill has one feature at all that will aid the consumer, it is the one that will give him notice that an article of food has been in cold storage. It does not make any difference to me, if an article has been in cold storage, whether it has been in cold storage 30 days or 130 days. I would like to know it. I have a right to know it. I have a right to know if it has been in cold storage or not. And yet the committee admits that the consumer when he buys from the retailer will not be able to get such information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 5, line 20, after the word "package," insert "nor shall any person alter, mutilate, destroy, obscure, or obliterate any statement or document required to be furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of section 7."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this section which has just been read prohibits any persons from mutilating or destroying the brand or label, but there seems to be no inhibition against destroying or altering the statement or document which the person may be required to give by the Secretary of Agriculture when it is found to be commercially impracticable to mark any article of food. And it would seem that if we were going to prohibit the destroying of the label or brand we might also prohibit the destruction of the statement or document which the Secretary is required to give.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the gentleman's amendment is quite proper, but does he not think it ought to be changed so as to designate the time during which it shall be an offense to destroy this? For instance, in section 7 it says that these papers shall be preserved—

For such time as the Secretary of Agriculture may by regulation prescribe.

Does not the gentleman think his amendment should be altered so as to make the offense cover that term?

Mr. WALSH. It is only the destruction of the statement that is required to be given by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That describes the statement.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think it should cover the time during which the same is required to be preserved?

Mr. WALSH. I would have no objection to the amendment being modified in that way. If the gentleman will suggest the language, I will be very glad to accept the modification.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would suggest the following language:

During the time the same is required to be preserved under the provisions of section 7.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Why not put it in as a part of section 7?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the modification. I desire to say, with reference to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that it is certainly refreshing; and the sentiment comes like an invigorating breeze from the clear, blue sky to hear one on that side of the aisle offer objections to a measure because it furnishes opportunity for employment and positions upon the Federal pay roll, particularly when the administration has during the past six or eight years been so active and generous, particularly toward members of his own party, in that regard; and I agree with what the gentleman says in that respect and with much that he said respecting this bill, and I wish to congratulate him upon expressing those sentiments to this large and enthusiastic assemblage following the course of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts as modified by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana to the amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: At the end of the amendment add "during the time the same is required to be preserved under the provisions of section 7."

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to speak against this amendment specifically, but this question has been constantly raised on the floor of the House, both by my colleague [Mr. CONNALLY] and others, that the ultimate consumer is not protected in so far as the features of this bill require the marking of an article as being a cold-storage article. The committee discussed that proposition at length, and proceeding under the commerce clause of the Constitution, the only power under which we could proceed to draft this legislation, we were confronted with the proposition that we could not carry the law to the individual consumer. I think any lawyer will understand that we can not do that in this bill. But what have we done? We have here a measure that will be a uniform cold-storage bill in every State of this Union, and if the legislatures of the respective States desire that the consumer shall know whether or not he is eating a cold-storage product or buying a cold-storage product—which I undertake to say they will—it is within the power of the legislatures of the respective States to pass simple statutory enactments, and carry this marking directly to the distributers in the local communities, and that is the only way you are going to do it. We went as far as we could go as a national legislative body, and now it is up to the respective States to see that this law is made effective to the consumer and the distributer in these localities.

Mr. BLACK. If I undersand the underlying object of this bill, it really is to prescribe that food shall not be kept in storage more than 12 months. That is the real object of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is the real object of the bill. Just one statement there: The cold-storage people can dodge the laws of the various States of the Union. Indiana, for instance, has a nine months' limit. The man who wants to hoard the stuff can keep it until the last day of the nine months' period and then ship it across into Illinois and carry it another 9 or 12 months. There is no way of making the provision effective, and that is the evil that we undertake to right by this law that we are passing. We have gone as far as we can go under the power of Congress.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill, it is simply to make uniform in the entire United States legislation that has been in successful operation in several States of the Union for a number of years.

I believe every Member of this House has the utmost confidence in the Agricultural Committee, with the possible exception of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who seeks to make politics out of a very important measure—in fact, one of the most important to come before this Congress. If he can do it and get away with it, why, well and good. I am going to appeal to the House to pass this bill in substantially the form that it has been reported out by the committee. The Agricultural Committee has given long and careful consideration to this legislation, and all who have looked into the cold-storage question at all must realize that there is an imperative necessity for uniform legislation over the entire country. If the States wish to supplement this legislation with local legislation, well and good. Such action would make it more effective, for Congress has no jurisdiction over intrastate commerce.

Mr. Chairman, the high cost of living is a partial outgrowth of the war and is not confined to our country alone, but is general throughout the wide world. Decreased production, brought on by the taking of 37,000,000 men from the ranks of producers for military purposes, thereby transforming them into consumers, has had much to do with it. Then, too, the situation has been aggravated by the actions of unscrupulous profiteers, who, taking advantage of the dire needs of the human family, by fair means and foul, have so manipulated the market as to create an artificial shortage far in excess of that created by the exigencies of the war. With a heartlessness unparalleled in the history of the world these Shylocks have used our being at war as an excuse for extracting from the pockets of the toilers unheard-of profits. Right here in the city of Washington, the Nation's Capital, profiteers have been allowed full sway. In many instances rents have advanced two or three hundred per cent. Merchants have followed suit, and we have been witnessing an unbroken chain of profiteering such as has never before been witnessed in this or in any other country.

The consumer naturally wishes to know why this condition has been allowed to go on unchecked. The best lawyers in Congress are agreed that the Department of Justice has ample power under the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts and the Lever Food-Control Act to successfully combat this evil. The first and last named of these measures "have teeth," and why the Government has failed to invoke these laws to protect the consumer is one of the many mysteries connected with the administration that have not yet been solved. In this connection I wish to read a newspaper extract from a confidential report recently received by the Senate from the Federal Trade Commission, which is as follows:

PACKERS' WAR PROFITS HIGH—REPORT TERMS THEM AS "UNREASONABLY HIGH"—ADVOCATES CHANGE.

WASHINGTON, September 24.

Disclosures concerning the packers' war-time profits and the attempt to have President Wilson change Food Administration regulations under which the packers operated were made to-day in a report submitted to the Senate by the Federal Trade Commission.

The report, which was in response to a resolution by Senator NORRIS of Nebraska, made public confidential correspondence which showed that the commission told the President the packers' profits were "unreasonably high," and that Food Administration regulations should be changed to "safeguard public interests."

The commission informed President Wilson in a report dated June 28, 1918, that packers' war profits were at a rate two and a quarter to three times their earnings in prewar years. The commission recommended that the whole food administration scheme of packer regulation be put on a different basis, and that classifications of the business into meat production and by-products on which a higher per cent was permissible be wiped out, and that the entire packer output be placed on a basis that would allow weight per cent profit. Excess, it urged, should be turned over to the Federal Treasury.

The report is said to have been withheld from publication during the war at the request of President Wilson, who feared it might injure the food-saving campaign of the Food Administration. Herbert Hoover also recommended that it be not published.

Let me read the last paragraph again for fear some of you may not have grasped its full significance:

The report is said to have been withheld from publication during the war at the request of President Wilson, who feared it might injure the food-saving campaign of the Food Administration. Herbert Hoover also recommended that it be not published.

Gentlemen, please do not think me partisan when I ask why President Wilson did not remove Mr. Hoover, or at least order that new regulations be promulgated. Why did President Wilson shield the Food Administration at the expense of the public? It is a notorious fact that the packers made profits in excess of 200 and 300 per cent during the war as compared with peace times. It is also a notorious fact that the large flour millers and grain dealers profited during the war as they had never profited before, and all this was allowed by a man who had been elected President in 1912 on the pledge that he would reduce the cost of living. Verily, verily, the packers and millers have powerful friends in high public offices. Strange as it may seem, not until the war was over—in fact, not until his return from the peace conference in Paris—did the President give any indication of realizing the existence of a condition that had given nearly every other American grave concern—the high cost of all necessaries of life. Why was not profiteering checked in its inception; and yet another why: Why have we not had governmental prosecutions of these profiteers? The people are crying aloud for relief, and it behooves the administration to give heed to the cry. Mere acts of Congress will not solve the problem for the people. The Department of Justice must carry the several statutes against profiteering, hoarding, and combinations in restraint of trade into effect through recourse to the courts when necessary. The sentences imposed for violation must carry imprisonment, for the violators only laugh at fines.

When I arose to speak I had intended to confine my remarks to the bill under consideration, but in view of the fact that there are several serious matters on my mind I will crave the indulgence of the House while I touch upon other subjects. The War Department has on hand at the present time thousands upon thousands of automobiles, many of them yet in crates, unpacked. These automobiles are being withheld from sale through an agreement entered into between the War Department and the automobile manufacturers to maintain prices. I recently visited Camp Holabird, Md., which is the headquarters of the motor transport branch of the Army. What I saw astonished me. Thousands of trucks and automobiles, the value of which ran into millions, are allowed to stand out in the weather, and absolutely without protection from the elements. Think of it, millions of dollars' worth of material, for which there is big public demand, being allowed to go to rack and ruin. Why does not the War Department direct the immediate sale of all of those motor-propelled vehicles and the proceeds therefrom covered back into the Federal Treasury, thereby relieving the drain on the taxpayers by that much?

I understand that millions of Army blankets and uniforms are being held in warehouses, where they have become food for moths. A short time ago a special committee of Congress investigating the War Department found that $150,000,000 worth of surplus foodstuffs was being held by the War Department, and the investigation showed that the officials in charge, by and with the consent of Secretary of War Baker, had entered into an agreement with the big packers and canners to keep this food off the market, so as to prevent a reduction in retail prices, and it was not until Congress passed a resolution directing the Secretary of War to sell this surplus food that a move was made to dispose of this vast amount of food, for which there was crying need throughout the country. The investigating committee also found that during the past summer several carloads of hams and bacon, valued at thousands of dollars, had been allowed to stand on a sidetrack near the city of Washington in the broiling July sun, until the entire consignment had become spoiled.

Gentlemen of Congress, we must convert words into action, that this appalling waste may be brought to a stop. I for one am patiently waiting for a definite recommendation from the several investigating committees which we have appointed, and I sincerely hope that they will be able to offer a solution for the problem. We must act, for the administration has shown an unwillingness to act.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that this bill is drawn in accordance with the desires of the packers, I will state that I know of no particular objection——

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAUGEN. The doors of the Committee on Agriculture were open during the hearings on the bill to every worthy and legitimate enterprise. The doors of the committee room have been open to the packers, to the farmers, and to the cold-storage people. They have all been invited, they have had their day in court, and they have been heard. We are as glad to hear one as we are to hear another, and I think the committee is to be congratulated on the fact that it has here a bill which meets with the approval, in so far as I know, of practically every interest. There are objections, of course, to some features of the bill. It is very difficult to draw a bill that will contain no objectionable features.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that the gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say "the packers"; I said the cold-storage men and the refrigerator people.

Mr. HAUGEN. The cold-storage people are satisfied with it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman need not be sensitive about it; the gentleman's report incorporated the resolution passed by these cold-storage and refrigerator interests.

Mr. HAUGEN. Speaking of the cold-storage people, the first draft of the bill provided for quarterly statements, and the very first request that the cold-storage people made was that they be monthly statements. We made them monthly. The cold-storage people are the ones burdened by making the statements.

Mr. CONNALLY. In answer to the request of the cold-storage people.

Mr. HAUGEN. If we are to have information on the subject, the oftener we get it the better. We did not want to provide for a daily or a weekly report, but we thought we might call for a quarterly report, and then additional reports as the Secretary of Agriculture wished to call for.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Just one moment, Mr. Chairman. If the bill does not carry the information to the consumer, the consumer can go to the cold-storage house to buy his goods and there obtain that information. The gentleman from Texas knows that after the goods pass out of interstate commerce Congress has no jurisdiction over them. It is not in the power of Congress to extend its own power; that can only be done by an amendment to the Constitution. We have followed it, and if the States will take up the legislation where we leave off the consumer will be given the information. We have gone as far as the committee had the power to go.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have been very much entertained by the explanation of the gentleman from Iowa. His explanation went a little further when he said that after the bill was drawn they had provided for quarterly reports, and the cold-storage people suggested that it should be made 30 days, and the committee readily agreed. I take it, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, that if he were framing a law against burglary the first thing he would do would be to call in the burglars and ask their view as to how the law should be drafted.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman thinks the cold-storage people are burglars he has a right to that opinion, but I do not consider them as such.

Mr. ANDERSON. If I wanted to find out how the burglary business was conducted, I certainly would call in the burglars; and that is what we did here.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no doubt the gentleman from Minnesota would gain a great deal of information in that line. But I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that if there are not some abuses in the cold-storage system, if there is not something wrong in the way the cold-storage business is conducted, why is it that the committee is spending its time and the valuable time of this House in tinkering with this law? If you are going to follow the suggestions and do exactly what the cold-storage interests require you to do, what is the use of having any law whatever? Carrying the analogy down the line, if you wanted to pass any kind of legislation in this country to correct an abuse in any line of business, you would call in the people engaged in that business who commit the abuses and ask their advice as to how to do it.

The result of the law is going to be, according to my humble opinion, instead of affording a real relief, you are going to give the cold-storage people an excuse to get behind and say to the public that this is a Federal law, it is interstate commerce, and you State legislatures must keep your hands off all articles that go into interstate commerce. They will say to the public, "Our warehouse is regulated by Federal law, and our articles are regulated by Federal law, and it is all right." A few years ago we used to look in the papers which carried whisky advertisements, claiming their goods were pure whisky because it was Government inspected. We used to see a handsome gentleman with gold braid on his cap and the United States insignia across his cap "United States Inspector." They said, "Therefore you can buy our liquor; it is good and pure, because it is United States inspected."

All the committee is trying to do is something that it can not do. They bring this bill before the House, and every time a Member rises on the floor and asks how about so-and-so, the committee throws up its hands and says that is beyond the power of Congress and beyond the power of the committee.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, just one minute to state that I do not by any means subscribe to the conclusion of the gentleman from Texas that all the cold-storage people are crooks. I know there are some honest men conducting that business in an honest and faithful manner.

Mr. CONNALLY. You are not trying to get any of those fellows who are conducting the business dishonestly. You are not trying to legislate them out of business.

Mr. HAUGEN. When we speak of the cold-storage people appearing before the committee we speak of the high-class cold-storage people that desire protection against the crook, and that is what this bill aims to do.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is to prevent the crooks that you say must mark the goods from taking them out, and you say they may take them out and remove the label?

Mr. HAUGEN. If they remove them in less than 30 days. If they remove the marks after the goods have been in cold storage more than 30 days, they are punished.

Mr. CONNALLY. You say they can remove it?

Mr. HAUGEN. They may remove the mark "cold storage" if the goods are kept in cold storage less than 30 days. It has been reported that eggs have been bought in China that have been kept there for years.

Now, then, gentlemen, under this bill the importation of such eggs will not now be permitted if they have been held in cold storage in that country more than 12 months. If more than 30 days, they have to be marked and treated the same as our own.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then why this provision that permits removing the marking on articles which have not remained in cold storage over 30 days?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is not considered cold storage.

Mr. CONNALLY. What prompted the committee——

Mr. HAUGEN. As I stated, in the first draft we exempted everything for 30 days. Now we have drafted it in the form presented here for this reason: If we exclude everything for 30 days it would be possible to store 29 days in one warehouse and then move the goods to another warehouse for 29 days, and thus have an endless chain over which we would have no check. The marking is necessary in order to check it up. We permit the removing of the mark "cold storage" if stored less than 30 days, but the date remains.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Division!

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the Chair misstated the amendment. My amendment was to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated the vote was upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It was the other way; the amendment was offered to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts and the amendment to the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. May we have that reported as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment as amended will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH, as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]: Page 5, line 20, after the word "package," insert "nor shall any person alter, mutilate, destroy, obscure, or obliterate any statement or document required to be furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of section 7 during the time the same is required to be preserved under the provisions of section 7."

The CHAIRMAN. A division has been called for.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, upon the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, I am inclined to accept the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes none.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. It shall be unlawful for any person to (i) ship or deliver for shipment in commerce, or (ii) hold in cold storage while in commerce, or (iii) sell or offer for sale in commerce, or (iiii) having received from shipment in commerce, sell or offer for sale in the original, unbroken package, any article of food which has been in cold storage, after the expiration of 12 months following the date on which the article of food was first placed in cold storage; except cheese held for the purpose of ripening and improving the quality thereof.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 2, after the word "of," strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "ten."

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered because when anyone proposes to store great quantities of food it immediately becomes a matter of public interest, and owing to the uncertainty of temperatures above freezing, all of which stimulate deterioration and decay, 10 months is sufficient time for food to remain under those conditions dangerous to health. The object is to protect the public who by inadvertence may buy and consume cold-storage food believing it to be new crop. Therefore we provide that all goods placed in storage must be removed and disposed of before the appearance of the new crop, and not in competition with ensuing season's production. By your action here the consumer is depending and expecting protection, and unless you give it to him in this measure, defeat the legislation and permit him to protect himself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask a question with reference to this section. Did not the hearings on this bill develop that poultry were not wholesome after being in storage more than nine months, and did not the Department of Agriculture experts in some instances also testify that poultry could not be kept in cold storage longer than two or three months?

Mr. HAUGEN. I believe Dr. Campbell, of the department, at one time stated that it could not be kept for more than three or four months, but that applied to some investigations made years ago, and was later corrected by Dr. Pennington, who has carried on extensive investigations and is an authority on the subject. She stated that poultry now could be kept in storage 12 months. Of course, there are a number of articles of food that enter into cold storage that can not be kept for 12 months. The gentleman will appreciate it is very difficult to point out the different ones in the time at our command and specify a period for each of the articles that enter into cold storage. The committee thought best to make a flat 12 months' limit. That was suggested by practically everyone who appeared before the committee. If the gentleman will turn to sections 10 and 17, he will find that in those sections we give authority to the department to seize food in commerce in such condition that it is likely immediately to become or is unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for food.

Mr. BRIGGS. This is in addition to the pure-food act, which only regulates putrid and decomposed matter.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. I believe it has been held that unless the food has actually deteriorated it would not be——

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman thinks, under the provision of section 10, power is vested in the Department of Agriculture to condemn unwholesome food which has been in storage for less than 12 months—poultry or any other commodity?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. (a) That no person shall receive in commerce any article of food for cold storage or transport in commerce any article of food in a refrigerator vehicle, after the warehouse in which it is to be stored or the refrigerator vehicle is found by the Secretary of Agriculture, after due notice and hearing, to be insanitary or otherwise unfit for the storage or transportation of any such article of food, and said finding shall remain in force until the Secretary shall, after further hearing, determine that such condition has been remedied; and in order to carry out the provisions of this section, as well as other provisions of this act, any officer, employee, or agent of the Secretary of Agriculture specifically authorized by him in writing, for the purpose, may on any business day during the usual hours of business enter any warehouse which receives or ships and any refrigerator vehicle which transports any article of food in commerce and may inspect the warehouse or vehicle and the contents and operation thereof, and any books, papers, letters, or other documents relating thereto.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether amendments will be in order at this point or do I have to wait——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait until the section is read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) No person shall receive in commerce any article of food for cold storage or transport any article of food in commerce in any refrigerator vehicle, if such person has refused inspection, when requested under this act, of such warehouse or refrigerator vehicle; nor shall any person ship in commerce any article of food if he has refused inspection of such article of food when requested under this act.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 6, strike out the words "that no person shall" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "it shall be considered a violation of this act to." And on page 7, line 1, strike out the words "no person shall" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "that it shall be in violation of this act to."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to leave to the courts the question of deciding whether or not a common carrier can accept for shipment products offered by shippers. It seems to me that we ought not to provide in this law that they shall not be permitted to accept, as a matter of law, which the courts ought to be allowed to construe. And it seemed to me that the language to which I offered a substitute is that it shall be considered a violation of the act instead. It seems to me, if my language is not correct, that the substance of that language ought to be put into the law instead of the language reported by the committee.

Mr. HAUGEN. That would immunize the officers or anybody shipping from punishment. What is the use of enacting a law unless you can punish somebody for violating the law?

Mr. MADDEN. It does not provide that somebody shall not be punished.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It says it shall be unlawful. In a later section, section 13, it says "any person who violates any provision." If you make it unlawful in section 10, and then there is anybody "who violates a provision of section 10," that would be peculiar.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that would be better language and more in conformity with the practice than to say arbitrarily that common carriers shall not receive for shipment. To say it is unlawful leaves it to the court as to the legality of the proposition. The mere operation of this law does not enforce it, and it surely ought to be within the right of a citizen of the United States to take his case to a court. He ought to have a chance to violate the law if he wants to do it, and then try the case in court as to whether or not he has violated it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That would make the language of the act more uniform, because section 3 uses that language, and section 9 uses it, "that it shall be unlawful for any person."

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the committee will accept the suggestion I have made.

Mr. DOWELL. I think the gentleman should strike out of the amendment the word "considered."

Mr. MADDEN. I will substitute, if I may be permitted to substitute by unanimous consent, the language "it shall be unlawful" instead of the language I have written. I am not a lawyer, and, of course, I have not been very clear in the use of the language, but I know what I want.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the alteration will be made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be agreed to. Some of the greatest abuses against the rights of citizens have been practiced by agents of the Agricultural Department heretofore where they have had the exact authority that is asked for in this section.

I recall where a little fellow with a long neck and a high collar—I think he was dubbed "doctor," or something—about 25 years of age, weight about 135 pounds, who had never killed a hog in his life or been at a hog killing, but had graduated from some sort of an institution that dubbed him as a "doctor," who passed a civil-service examination and was appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture to be the chief inspector at a packing house that was doing an interstate and otherwise quite a large business.

The man who established that business commenced working at a packing house when he was 10 years old, and had put in 60 years working in connection with the packing industry. Naturally, he thought he knew more about his plant than this little doctor who came there to run it. They got into some wordy altercation. Soon after this little fellow came down there and began to tell that old packing-house employee, and packing-house manager, and packing-house owner, how to run a packing house. Matters kept going on from bad to worse, and finally when old man Hanneberry went down to his packing house one morning he found it closed with this fellow's seal on it, and that packing house remained closed for a period of about six weeks. Hanneberry came here, hired some lawyers, and tried to make his case before the Secretary of Agriculture. They pointed to the law under which this little fellow had a right to go down there and close that place, because Hanneberry had not done what the little fellow had told him to do. Finally it was arranged that Mr. Hanneberry's packing house should be opened. He had lost in the meantime a large amount of business, a great amount of meat had gone to waste, and, all told, his losses were some $15,000 or $18,000, all because this little bit of a whippersnapper had authority that nobody ought to have in this country.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How would the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] interfere with such operations of the little fellow?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not think he would have authority to refuse to take that. It would be unlawful.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. He would not have anything to do with it if that fellow had come down and made an investigation as to the sanitary conditions, and made it final. He would not be effected by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think he would be affected by this:

No person shall receive in commerce any article of food or cold storage or transport any article of food in commerce in any refrigerator vehicle if such person has refused inspection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The question of the manner in which this very inspection is refused is not described. It is left solely to the discretion of this little fellow. If the inspection has been refused, the meat can not be transported. It should be a question of judicial determination. It ought not to be left to the discretion of this individual. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. The question I want to ask is this, Is there any difference now in the language "no person shall receive" and "it shall be unlawful to receive"? Is there any difference from a legal standpoint as to his authority?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I would like to have the gentleman explain it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. As the matter now reads, the little fellow who attempted to make the inspection and was kicked off the premises is simply the law to himself. He will refuse the transportation. But when it is said that it shall be unlawful, then that is a matter to be judicially determined.

Mr. DOWELL. But when you say "No person shall receive" you mean he shall not lawfully receive, and that he can not lawfully receive.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is not what it says.

Mr. DOWELL. It is what it means. I can conceive of nothing else that it can mean. It makes it unlawful for him to receive it, whether you say "No person shall receive" or "It shall be unlawful to receive."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It says, "No person shall, if refused inspection."

Mr. DOWELL. That means that it shall be unlawful to receive it.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Where it refers to "such person," would not that clause have to be amended so as to say "the consignor or shipper"? That is on page 7, line 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. What person would that refer to?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. "If such person has refused inspection." Is the gentleman's question as to whom "such person" refers?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the shipper. That is as clear as anything in the section.

Mr. ANDERSON. The owner of the warehouse.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; the owner of the warehouse; the man who is holding the place open to the reception of that product.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to be in disagreement with my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], but the amendment which he offers, while very simple in language, is nevertheless quite profound in effect. The difference between the effect of the language which the gentleman from Illinois offered and the effect of the bill as it stands is to permit the insanitary condition of the warehouse to be tried out in court first before you can prohibit any receiving of goods into that warehouse. In other words, under his amendment, before you can prevent the receipt of goods into a warehouse that is wholly insanitary and wholly unfit, it would be necessary to try the case in court and satisfy the court and jury that that condition existed. Under the bill as it is drawn, the Secretary finds that the condition is insanitary. Thereafter it is unlawful immediately for any person to receive in that particular warehouse or refrigerator car any goods in commerce.

I want to call attention to the fact that the committee has very carefully worded this section. We did not provide that it should be unlawful to ship any goods out of a warehouse which was found to be insanitary, because clearly the goods in the warehouse might be wholesome and entirely fit food, even though the warehouse itself was insanitary. And more than that, we thought that it would be unfair to punish the man who had goods in the warehouse for the failure of the warehouseman. Therefore we only provided in this section that it should be unlawful for the warehouseman or the person operating the refrigerator car to receive goods in that particular warehouse or in that particular refrigerator car after it had been found insanitary or unfit for the storage of food.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But that is not what the language says.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is what it clearly says.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It does not say that it shall be unlawful. It leaves it within the discretion of the man who has attempted to make the inspection, or who has found the alleged insanitary conditions, to say whether or not this shall be done.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is unlawful. The penal section applies to it, and this section follows the same general line of the bill. We followed this general policy in drafting this bill: We prohibit certain things from being done in the language, "No person shall do so and so," in one section. We then put in a penalty for violation. If we had followed the rule which my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and which my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] suggest it would have been necessary in every case to have said, "It is unlawful," and then to add, "Every person guilty of doing so and so shall be punished," and so on. We thought it best to make a prohibition; and then, having done that, to put in a section punishing violations of the law.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I wanted to get clear in my mind was whether or not the Committee on Agriculture really intended to give the discretion to the individual who was making the inspection to say whether or not meat should or should not be received in that warehouse, and that he should make that decision.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the language that "after due notice and hearing the Secretary shall," and so forth.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am reading this independent section.

Mr. ANDERSON. It says in this section, in line 10, "is found by the Secretary of Agriculture, after due notice and hearing, to be insanitary," and so forth. That clearly contemplates that there shall be something more than a mere inspection by some inspector of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I wish to discuss this amendment, unless some member of the committee is seeking recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me to be possible to construe the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has construed it. Look to subsection (b) of section 6, which is proposed to be amended. The language of the bill is: "That no person shall receive in commerce." The gentleman from Illinois suggests as a substitute for this language: "It shall be unlawful to receive in commerce." There is a requirement of fact in this section, before the inhibition of the section becomes operative. The change in language suggested will not in any wise affect that requirement of fact. It is made unlawful to receive goods, if an owner has refused to admit an inspector to make an inspection of the premises. Nothing is stated, or required as to the character of the inspection. Whether you use the one language, or the other, it will not be possible to enter into the inquiry whether the inspector if admitted, would have made a lawful or an unlawful inspection, a proper, or an improper inspection. The sole question of fact is whether an inspector applied in the one instance to the warehouse keeper, or in the other instance to the refrigerator car owner, to be allowed to make an inspection and was refused. If he did, and was refused, the inhibition attaches. That is all. If the owner refused to allow the inspection to be made, then according to the language of the committee's provision, the goods shall not be received, while according to the language of the gentleman from Illinois, it would be unlawful to receive them. There is no real and sufficient objection that I can perceive to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The language of that amendment is precisely to the same effect as that found in the bill.

If the amendment could possibly carry the meaning that was given to it by the gentleman from Minnesota, I should be opposed to it, as being unnecessary and unwise, but the real difference presented, is merely one of phrasing. I believe the words—

It shall be unlawful to receive—possibly conform a little more closely to the usual phrasing, but that is all the merit the amendment possesses. The change in language does not change the meaning of the bill in one jot, or tittle, since in either view of the case the inhibition to receive the goods offered will hang upon the question of fact whether or not an inspection has been denied to the inspector seeking to make the same. As I have said, I do not think that the effect that was imputed to the amendment by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], is a correct deduction from the terms of that amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The construction which I have given to this part of the section has been given to a similar law now on the statute book, providing for the inspection of packing houses, and they have closed packing houses under exactly this language.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The language of the two cases must be different. The language of the bill is as follows:

No person shall receive in commerce any article of food for cold storage or transport any article of food in commerce in any refrigerator vehicle, if such person has refused inspection, when requested under this act.

This is a simple declaration to the effect that if an inspection has been refused, the goods shall not be received. Adopt the language of the amendment, and the section as amended would provide that if an inspection is refused, it shall be unlawful to receive the goods. The difference in meaning is much less than the difference between tweedle dum and tweedle dee.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman has read subsection (b) and this amendment is offered to subsection (a).

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am talking about both. What I have said applies particularly to the subsection. The same amendment is offered to the section and the subsection.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. How could the word "such person," in line 3, page 7, apply if the words "no person," in line 1, page 7, are stricken out, as is proposed in the amendment?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I simply say, with respect to the proposed amendment that it will have no effect whatever upon the meaning of the section, or the subsection. Of course if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is adopted, consequential amendments may be necessary.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I agree with my colleague about that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Whether the bill stands or the amendment is agreed to, if there has been a refusal to allow an inspection to be made, then the goods may not be received. That fairly states the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. In view of the fact that both amendments are in the same language, if there be no objection both amendments will be put at the same time as one.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HAUGEN) there were—ayes 10, noes 36.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. JUUL. I move to strike out, in line 18, page 6, in section 10 (a), after the word "any," the word "business," and in line 19 the words "during the usual hours of business."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JUUL: Page 6, line 18, after the word "any," strike out the word "business"; in line 19 strike out the words "during the usual hours of business."

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the inspection of warehouses is not all that is concerned in section 10. It also includes the inspection of vehicles; and I suggest to the gentleman that to inspect any vehicle, which might mean a railway freight car, during the usual hours of business of any business day, might be an absolute impossibility. Cars enter railway yards at any hour during the day or night, and if the Government inspector had to inspect a vehicle or railway car and was told while the car was in transit through the city that it was not a business day or the usual business hours, he might be prevented from making the inspection, because the car might come into the city on Saturday night after 6 o'clock, or on Sunday, and he might not have any opportunity of investigating and examining the very cars, vehicles, or warehouses that we want to reach.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will refer to page 2, lines 11, 12, and 13, he will find that—

The term "refrigerator vehicle" includes any car, vessel, or other vehicle, or portion thereof, which is designed and used for the transportation of any article of food at or below the temperature of 45° above zero, Fahrenheit.

It can not be classed as a vehicle unless the temperature is below 45° F.

Mr. JUUL. Yes; but I do not see why the gentleman should want to provide that no investigation shall take place except during the usual hours of a business day. I should want to make an investigation at the time when I thought they were doing the unlawful work. Likewise I should like to investigate when they were trying to remove the 30-day marks. You are just simply wanting the Government to tell these men, "Now, you do your unlawful work after 6 o'clock at night, because if we do not come before 6 o'clock we are not coming at all."

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe an inspector can determine by going outside of business hours whether they are conducting their business properly or not?

Mr. JUUL. Under the language of this bill the inspectors could only inspect any car or vehicle between certain hours of the day, between 9 o'clock in the forenoon and 6 o'clock in the evening, and the time after 6 o'clock is when irregularities would take place.

Mr. DOWELL. By striking out the words you desire to strike out you permit them to go into the plant on Sunday or in the middle of the night.

Mr. JUUL. At any time.

Mr. DOWELL. And if they are refused admission at any time then the law is being violated?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman desire to have the business conducted during the usual hours of the business day, or does he want it to be conducted at all times?

Mr. JUUL. I would say to the gentleman that freight cars enter railroad yards at all hours, on Saturday nights and Sundays.

Mr. DOWELL. But the gentleman's amendment affects all the business.

Mr. JUUL. I will read the section to the gentleman in the manner in which it will read with the words stricken out:

Any officer, employee, or agent of the Secretary of Agriculture specifically authorized by him in writing, for the purpose, may on any day enter any warehouse which receives or ships and any refrigerator vehicle which transports any article of food in commerce and may inspect the warehouse or vehicle and the contents and operation thereof, and any books, papers, letters, or other documents relating thereto.

And that is what he ought to have the privilege of doing.

Mr. DOWELL. But by striking this out you permit him to enter the warehouse at any time, whether it is a business day or whether there is anybody there.

Mr. JUUL. That is correct. There will always be somebody there.

Mr. DOWELL. Presumably. But does the gentleman want this business to be conducted on Sundays and days that are not business days?

Mr. JUUL. No; but I wish to state to the gentleman that if some one in connection with the Government service learns that crooked work is going on in a warehouse, he ought not to be barred from entering the warehouse at the time the crooked business is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JUUL) there were 3 ayes and 17 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 6, line 23, the words "papers, letters, and other documents."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 6, line 23, strike out the words "papers, letters, and other documents."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this authority is not alone in the Secretary of Agriculture, but in any officer, employee, or agent of the Secretary of Agriculture. Of course, the agent and the employee must be specifically authorized in writing. I think this section does not preserve the rights of the ordinary American citizen against unreasonable or unwarrantable service. It is not a case where any judicial proceeding is pending. It is merely a case of an inspector going out for the purpose of finding evidence. It does not require any search warrant or any sort of complaint or judicial proceeding, and it gives the authority not only to search the books—and I propose to leave that authority there—but it gives the authority to the agent of the Secretary of Agriculture to inspect the papers, letters, and other documents. This part I desire to have stricken out. I do not think it is necessary, and I think we ought to be careful to safeguard the ordinary rights of the American citizen.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any difference in the inspection of books and the inspection of papers? What argument is there against the inspection of papers?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, it might be necessary to inspect the books.

Mr. DOWELL. And frequently necessary to inspect other papers.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Including letters?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman think that we ought to give a subordinate of the Agricultural Department the power and authority to inspect letters of a business concern or a private individual?

Mr. DOWELL. They are to be inspected for a specific purpose. It seems to me that if we permit him to examine the books, that any paper that relates to the transaction in explanation ought also to be examined.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If it were a judicial investigation where he had a search warrant a different case would be presented.

Mr. DOWELL. Whether it is judicial or otherwise, they are to determine the question upon evidence.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it unnecessary and improper to give authority to examine papers.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. How could you verify the books if you did not get a chance to inspect the invoices?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If you want to allow him to inspect the invoices you might do that, but to use general terms where any letter or document of an individual or a partnership or a corporation could be overhauled, I think it is improper.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I do not see how they could get along without they do have the authority to inspect the books and invoices.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to advert continually to the consideration and care that was given this bill by the Committee on Agriculture, but it seems necessary to direct attention to the fact that the committee has exercised some care in the preparation of this bill in order that it may be understood that objections just such as are urged by the gentleman from Indiana have been thoroughly considered.

I want to call attention to the last three lines of section 10, which read:

And may inspect the warehouse or vehicle and the contents and operation thereof, and any books, papers, letters, or other documents relating thereto.

I wish to call particular attention to the words "contents and operation thereof, and any books, papers, letters, or other documents relating thereto." Relating to what? Relating to the contents and operation of the warehouse. It is not the financial operation but the physical operation of the warehouse. There are many papers, such as invoices, to which the gentleman from New Jersey calls attention, and others relating to the physical operation of the warehouse, besides the books, which should be open to inspection if we are to make certain that the requirements of this law are met in accordance with its letter and spirit.

The committee limited this particular authority of the Secretary of Agriculture just as closely as it is possible to do it and still have sufficient teeth in the bill to make certain that the provisions of the act will not be violated. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana ought not to be adopted. It ought not to, because it could not be without defeating the efficient execution of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. In the course of the discussion on section 9, I understood the gentleman to say that there were certain perishable products which could not advantageously be retained in cold storage more than three months.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. While the provisions of section 9 permit, in general, a retention of 12 months for all foodstuffs, he stated that there was elsewhere in the bill a provision which took care of what might be termed the short-lived foodstuffs. I understood him to say further that this provision was in section 10.

Mr. HAUGEN. No; I was mistaken about that, and I intended to so state. It is section 17, which reads:

Whenever it appears that any article of food in transportation in a refrigerator vehicle in commerce or in cold storage in the District of Columbia or a Territory is in such a condition that it is likely to immediately become or is unsound, unwholesome, unfit for food—

That they may condemn it.

Mr. ROGERS. I observed the provision of section 17. But it refers only to articles in refrigerator vehicles and articles in cold storage within the District of Columbia or the Territories. Of course, that is only a very small proportion of the whole quantity of foodstuffs which are being regulated by this bill. Is it because of the constitutional limitations of the commerce clause that the gentleman so narrowly restricted the provisions of section 17?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, the pure-food law takes care of the other part of it.

Mr. ROGERS. In other words, that is already a part of the law of the land, so that we do not need to deal with it in this law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, if it is in order, I would like to move to strike out the word "letters." The amendment which has been just voted upon covered other words, and I move to strike out the word "letters."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEENERSON: Page 6, line 23, strike out the word "letters."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is our duty to respect the Constitution, and although we might pass this provision, it is very doubtful if it would be held valid, because the Constitution provides that all persons shall be secure in their persons and papers against unreasonable searches and seizures. In regard to letters, I recall distinctly the case of Jackson against the United States, where the question was as to the opening and looking at letters which were in the mail and related to lottery tickets, and the court declared that a letter in the possession of the Post Office was just as sacred as if it were in the sender's own possession or in his own habitation. Now, it is the policy of the Government to encourage confidence in communications by mail, and where the matter is in the possession of the writer or of the recipient it is respected under that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What does the gentleman think about this proposition that a person does not have to testify against himself? This applies to persons as well as to corporations. The very purpose is to obtain evidence for the purpose of a conviction. Now, can they go to the individual person and have access to his private papers in order to use that for evidence or to furnish evidence whether it be introduced in evidence or not?

Mr. STEENERSON. The court in the case I refer to has said that Congress could not authorize the officials of the Government or the officials of the Post Office Department to inspect letters. Neither could we authorize, it seems to me, the Department of Agriculture or the officials of that department to violate a confidence that is sought to be protected by this provision of the Constitution. A letter in one's possession is protected by this constitutional provision the same as if it were in the mail.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not the purpose here to require the men to comply with the law?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, as I understand it, it confers upon the Secretary of Agriculture the power to inspect and examine letters and papers.

Mr. DOWELL. It gives him the authority, and the purpose of permitting this examination is to require him to have his books in shape showing compliance with the law.

Mr. STEENERSON. My theory is that if we leave this language in the shape in which it is written it might conflict with the provisions of the fourth constitutional amendment and thereby make the whole clause void. I am anxious to go as far as the Constitution will permit, but if you overstep it you might mix this thing up with something which is impossible of accomplishment by legislation.

Mr. DOWELL. But this is not in the mail; it is papers in a warehouse.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know it is not in the mail. The court has said that a letter while in the mail was exactly the same as in the man's own possession, and you could not go and seize it there unless you had a warrant. You must have a search warrant supported by oath or affirmation particularly describing the place to be searched to search for a particular letter, but this does not require a search warrant or the affidavit of witnesses. It simply authorizes "any officer, employee, or agent of the Secretary of Agriculture" to make the inspection.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I am just as anxious as the gentleman who just spoke or any other gentleman to safeguard the individual or the business of the country. We are not trying to harass the business of the country, yet we do not want to send out a straw man from the Department of Agriculture to find offenders against this statute if it is enacted. The gentleman seeks to strike out the word "letters." I can conceive of many cases wherein that might work a hardship, but the only evidence against an offender under this act might be the letters in possession of the person, firm, or corporation violating the law, and I therefore believe the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, if we have not passed section 10 I desire to offer another amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to five minutes on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JUUL. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Iowa might want to debate my amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then we could divide the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, after the word "particular," in line 25, page 7, the following new section:

SEC. 12. Nor shall any person ship in commerce any poultry or game if the entrails of such poultry or game were not removed prior to the time of being received for cold storage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JUUL: Page 7, line 25, after the word "particular," insert new section:

"SEC. 12. Nor shall any person ship in commerce any poultry or game if the entrails of such poultry or game were not removed prior to the time of being received for cold storage."

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. JUUL. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on many occasions when food poisoning has taken place on quite large scales excuses were offered by cooks and chefs in great hotels that the poisoning took place because the poultry had been stored too long and stored with the entrails contained in the poultry. I think the mere thought of sitting down and eating food in which the entrails have been kept for a year or more ought to be disgusting to any man of clean thoughts and clean habits. There is no reason in the world why the poultry should not be cleaned before it is warehoused. And I sincerely hope the chairman and the gentlemen composing this Committee on Agriculture will see that this is a clean amendment, an amendment to keep people healthy and sound, and that they will adopt it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman has read the hearings on this bill he will know that the experts of the Department of Agriculture, including those from the Bureau of Chemistry and other departments of the Government, testify that a fowl keeps just as well in cold storage with the entrails in as if they had been removed.

Mr. JUUL. Now, I want to tell the gentleman that there are no people on earth that know as much about cold storage as did the ancient Egyptians. You find from examining some of these ancient Egyptians, after they have rested for four or five thousand years, that the first thing the Egyptians did when they embalmed them was to take the entrails out. And, gentlemen, you have eaten chickens that may have rested in a cold-storage warehouse a year or more with the entrails in them, but I do not like them, and I think we ought to rid the people of that nasty mess to-day. There is not a cook in Chicago but that will say that the Government is incorrect in the statement, and when a poisoning case arises the first thing the cook or chef does is to prove the cleanliness of his kitchen and the rottenness of the chicken.

Mr. HAUGEN. Would it not be better to leave it to the department, who have more or less jurisdiction of this matter, as to the seizure of the goods? Extensive investigation is going on from time to time.

Mr. JUUL. Let us not take the department's idea, but let us use common sense. The gentleman knows he does not want on his table anything in which the entrails have stayed for a year or more after it has been killed. I do not want it on my table.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman said he would give me what time I needed.

Mr. HAUGEN. I said that I would divide the time with you. I ask for another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield in that minute? I want to ask if the gentleman thinks it is germane to this section, which provides for inspection alone?

Mr. JUUL. Yes; I think it is germane; and I think you gentlemen sitting here and looking out for the welfare and health and cleanliness and sanitation of the American people could well afford to let this amendment go in. No one where I come from wants any filth in his food. If you want it where you live, that is up to you. You can go out in the yard and wring the neck of a chicken, and get it clean, and have it fresh on your table. We are the people who have to eat that stuff. I want you to help me get rid of it.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order. By doing so I do not want to suggest that I am necessarily opposed to the amendment, but I do not think it is germane to this section, which provides purely for inspection. It does not have anything to do with the nature of the product that has to go into storage.

Mr. JUUL. That is what this section is supposed to relate to, inspection and cleanliness not only of the buildings but it relates to the stuff that goes into them. And I am going to ask that the Members of Congress come in on this floor and pass on this question. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

The Chair proceeded to count.

Mr. JUUL (during the counting). I hope the gentlemen on this floor——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point?

Mr. PURNELL. I do not withdraw the point of order.

Mr. JUUL. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of no quorum.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JUUL. I ask for three minutes in which to address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for three minutes to address the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have not offered this amendment in an idle mood. I have thought of it time and time again when I have seen chickens that were blue, and turning nearly black, from the filth that was in them, and then would be put into a soda bath or salt bath, and cleaned up and sold. If the same poultry had been cleansed before being put in cold storage the people would have had clean food to eat. Now, you know who gets the spoiled meat. The poor people are getting it. The people who can afford to pay a high price for good food can obtain it at any and at all times in a clean condition. There are tons and tons of stuff of this kind going to waste annually, and people who ought not to be permitted to buy it do buy it. You gentlemen are sitting here with the power of stopping the infernal traffic in spoiled meat, which is spoiled simply because the people dealing with it do not want to deal with the matter of drawn poultry. You must understand that the entrails of a chicken weigh something, and these dealers are interested in having the poultry weigh as much as possible. Let us stop this thing and require that the chicken be sold with the entrails drawn, so that it will be clean.

This is one of the most serious things in this entire bill that you have been dealing with. People are poisoned like dogs from eating the filthy stuff that is sent out of the back doors of warehouses. Who gets it? The people who are unable to buy good food have to take this rotten stuff. I notice gentlemen are smiling at me because I am asking that we enact a measure that will get rid of this situation.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Has any expert in the Department of Agriculture announced that it is necessary or better to have the entrails in?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. I have sat here and listened to these experts for 20 years, men who have given this matter time and thought and consideration, and they tell us that this is the proper way to do it. Now, then, if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman we simply disorganize the whole cold-storage business. I believe it is safe now to leave the matter with the department. The department under this bill has the right to seize and condemn poultry that is unfit for food.

Mr. RUCKER. It seems to me the practice of shipping fowls with the entrails drawn is more honored in the breach than in the observance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, can the amendment be reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending on the amendment. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Members of the committee will recognize that the point of order does not involve the merits of an amendment. The rules as to germaneness require that an amendment must not only be germane to the bill but to the section to which it applies. This provision that is sought to be amended refers to inspection, while the amendment refers to the conditions of shipment. Therefore the amendment is not germane to the provision, and the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. (a) That every warehouseman and every person transporting in commerce in a refrigerator vehicle any article of food shall keep accurate records and accounts and make in such manner or form, verified under oath or otherwise, as the Secretary of Agriculture may require, monthly reports giving full information as to the amounts of all articles of food held in cold storage and in any cooling or chilling room, and in all refrigerator vehicles maintained, operated, or controlled by him; and such other reports or returns as to amounts, ownership, and storage space as the Secretary of Agriculture may require.

(b) No person shall willfully (1) fail or refuse to make full and true entries or make any false entry in the accounts or records of his business required to be kept pursuant to this section; (2) alter, mutilate, conceal, or destroy any such account or record; or (3) fail or refuse to make any required report or return or make any report false or fraudulent in any material particular.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 7, line 14, after the word "storage," insert the words "by him" and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to confine the reports to be required monthly to cold-storage products and to eliminate from the provisions of the reports such products as may be held in cooling rooms and chilling rooms and in refrigerating vehicles.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that when we make the requirement that reports shall be made, these requirements should be confined to the cold-storage products. We are maintaining here that cooling and chilling is not a part of the cold storage. I maintain that all meats, fresh meats and fresh-meat products, require to be chilled and cooled before they can become salable or edible. As a matter of fact, they are chilled and cooled, but they are not subject to the brand, as I understand it, if they are not retained in cold storage for a period of 30 days or more. And if they are not required to be branded as in cold storage, there is no reason why we should require reports to be made of such products.

I hope the committee will see the wisdom of adopting the amendment to strike out all after the word "storage," in line 14, page 7, in section 11. I did not mean to include paragraph (b). I intended only to include paragraph (a).

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is wrong in offering his amendment. There are many reasons why it is necessary for the Secretary to receive periodical reports, and it was thought best to have them made monthly. It is necessary, for one reason, to have full reports of all products that are in cold storage, cooling and chilling rooms, and all refrigerator vehicles occasionally, so that it may be known how much of all these different kinds of food there is in the country at a given time. For the purpose of trade and commerce and for the information of those who are producing, buying, and selling, it is valuable to have that information. And it will be helpful to the Secretary of Agriculture in administering this law if complete reports are made as to conditions on certain dates.

Now, as to the last three lines, which the gentleman's amendment would strike out, when the monthly reports are received they may not be entirely satisfactory. Something may have been overlooked, and it is incumbent upon the Secretary to get the information that is lacking. He would be authorized under this section, if it remains unamended, to ask for additional reports and additional information which will be helpful to him in administering the law. In my judgment, no part of that should be stricken out.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois complains, and has complained before, that attention is given to the cooling rooms and chilling rooms. Cooling rooms and chilling rooms are artificially cooled below the temperature of 45 degrees. In that respect they are just like a permanent cold-storage room. The meats and some other products that are going into permanent cold storage—I mean by that to remain a considerable length of time—pass through these cooling rooms and chilling rooms. That is a portion of the time that they are kept in a frozen condition. That is a portion of the time that they are kept in cold storage. There is no change in the conditions between the chilling room or cooling room and the permanent storage room. Then why should not the time—12 months—permitted by this bill cover the period during which the food is in each one and in all of these different places?

Mr. MADDEN. I will tell the gentleman, if he will permit me. It is because all fresh meat has to go into the cooling room, into the chilling room, and is there held at a temperature of 38, and all the meats that are sold immediately are sold out of these chilling rooms, and you put the fresh meat products in the position of being cold storage, and thereby destroy the value of the meats to the men who raise the cattle.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if meats are placed in the cooling room or chilling room, and if while there no account is taken of them, they can remain there for 30 days and then be transferred to the permanent cold-storage warehouse, and the total time of storage of those articles will be 13 months instead of 12. Suppose they are shipped in commerce from the chilling rooms and cooling rooms before they go into the permanent cold-storage warehouse. Suppose they are shipped before 30 days. They are then marked not with the words "cold storage" but with the date when they went into the chilling or cooling room and the date when they came out. If that will interfere with the trade in or consumption of these articles of food, I do not understand the psychology of the proposition. It would seem to me that it would be a help to those who are dealing in and using those articles to know that they have been in storage less than 30 days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The prejudice against cold storage and the doubt and fear that besets people all the time respecting articles of food is that they do not know how long the food has been in cold storage. If they can be assured by the marks on the food that it has been in storage less than 30 days, they will be entirely satisfied; they will receive those products with the assurance that they have not been kept in storage so long that their quality or condition has deteriorated. They will be satisfied with them, they will welcome them, and be willing to use them.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. You can tell the people who run the cold-storage plants and the slaughterhouses of the country to do all the things that this provision calls for, and then when the meat gets into the hands of the retailer, and the consumer comes to buy it, he does not get a certificate from the retail butcher, does he?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. There is difficulty in following the meat to the retail butcher and from the retail butcher to the consumer, because the Federal Government can not exercise that control. Control can be exercised only by the States, if they wish to exercise it. But the fact that something we do not wish can be done with this food after it leaves the control of the Federal Government does not militate against the propriety of this act.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I think this is one of the most important provisions in this bill. It developed in the hearing, in the testimony of Mr. Waddell, who had charge of the products of Armour & Co., that this would not be any hardship on them. In the hearing, at page 410, you will find where I asked him this question:

> It would not cause any serious loss to your company to keep a record of that, would it?
> Mr. WADDELL. No; that would not be impossible at all.
> Mr. HUTCHINSON. It would not be impossible?
> Mr. WADDELL. It would be no hardship; no, sir.

Now, the point, Mr. Chairman, is this: Mr. Waddell testified that there were 118,000,000 pounds of pork in storage at Armour & Co.'s alone when he was before the committee. The hog goes into a cooling room and is there about 48 hours. It then goes to the cutting room and is divided up. It goes then, the part which is sold fresh, to one destination, and the rest into freezing rooms.

We have, according to the testimony of Mr. Waddell, in Armour & Co.'s warehouses, 45,000,000 pounds in the freezers, and 73,000,000 pounds would practically be in curing rooms, and people do not like to have a lot of pork in freezers that can be kept there an unlimited time, and then when there is a demand have them take it out and cure it in hams and bacon.

I think the amendment ought not to pass.

Mr. RUBEY. I move to strike out the last word. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. If there was any provision in this bill from first to last to which the packers objected, it was the provision which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is seeking to have stricken out. They have their packing houses scattered all over this country, and in connection with those packing houses they have their cooling rooms, and for some reason or other they do not want this provision put in here. I think it ought to be in the bill, because we want to give to this country a correct statement every month of the amount of food in cold storage, and unless you retain this particular provision you can not get an accurate and complete statement of the food in cold storage throughout the entire country.

I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a separate section to be inserted between section 11 (a) and section 11 (b).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. JUUL: Section 11 (b), to follow section 11 (a), page 7, line 18:
> "Nor shall any person ship in commerce any poultry or game if the entrails of such poultry or game were not removed at the time of being received for cold storage."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the section in connection with which it is offered.

Mr. JUUL. It is not an amendment to the section; it is a new section.

Mr. ANDERSON. Whether it is a new or an old section, it has to be germane to a section of the bill to which it is offered. It is not in order as a new section, and is not in order as an amendment to a section. If it was not in order to the other section, it is not in order to this section, because this relates entirely to keeping books, accounts, and making reports, and so forth.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. I do not care to take up the time of the committee if the Chair has made up his mind. I know nothing about the merits or demerits of this amendment, but I do have some interest in the maintenance of the rules of the House. The point of order against the amendment was simply on the ground that it was not in order to offer a new section to the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman specifically and clearly made the point that it was not in order, because it did not relate to that section, and that it had to relate to some section in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. That has been the ruling of the Chair heretofore.

Mr. CRISP. If that ruling were to prevail, it would bind and gag the House. You could not add anything to a bill unless the committee reporting it so provided. The subject matter of this bill is to regulate cold storage. The gentleman from Illinois proposes an amendment, adding a new section, which is germane to the subject matter of the bill, dealing with the question of cold storage. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is undoubtedly in order to offer a new section to any bill, provided the proposed section is germane to the subject matter of the bill under consideration.

Now, as I have said, I have no interest in this controversy; I know nothing of the merits or demerits of the proposition, but I do know clearly that under the rules of the House it is perfectly competent for this committee to add a new section to the bill, provided the section is germane to the subject matter of the bill before the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to be an expert in parliamentary procedure, but I have a very distinct recollection of advancing exactly the same argument in connection with a bill which was recently under consideration, and in that case it was held by the Chair that a new section must not only be germane to the bill but must be an amendment to some section, and that it must be germane to that section. It must be germane to something.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. If it must be germane to some section and be an amendment to some section, how could you ever get a new section into a bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. It is offered as a new section, but is not germane to the section just read.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman seriously contend that an amendment offering to regulate or define what may go into cold storage is not in order in a cold-storage measure?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not saying that there is no place in the bill where the amendment would not be germane. I am simply asserting that it is not germane to this section, either as a new section or as a new paragraph, in the place it is offered.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I fear that my friend has the consideration of this bill confused with a revenue bill. There is a clause in the rules of the House dealing with revenue bills which contravenes all general parliamentary rules. That rule was put in by our side when we had control, and was put in for a purpose, and you gentlemen have adopted the same rule—that any amendment to a revenue bill must relate to some item or section in the bill.

But that does not apply to the general ordinary parliamentary procedure. It is contrary to the general parliamentary rule, and that rule can not be extended; it must apply solely to revenue bills as stated in the rule.

The one thing I am interested in is to see that the rules of the House are maintained. I do recall one instance; I think it was when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was in the chair. There was some amendment offered and a ruling made that you could not add a new section unless it was germane to the section preceding. It was not debated, and the Chair ruled that it could not be done. I think that was clearly contrary to the general parliamentary rules, contrary to the rules of the House, and when this proposition came up I wanted to present this matter to this Chairman because the Chairman is a member of the Committee on Rules, is a parliamentarian, and I know wants to follow the practice of the House. I do not believe this House wants to tie its hands so that it can not put a new section on any bill reported by the committee unless that committee puts in a section which it relates to. In considering legislation there may be a great many matters not in the bill which are germane to the subject matter of the legislation. In this case you are dealing with cold-storage legislation, and anything germane to the regulation of cold storage is in order for this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider in connection with this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Just one word. The gentleman from Georgia referred to the decision to which the Chair refers. I, too, have no interest in this controversy except the very proper one of seeing the rules of the House enforced and that those rules are uniformly enforced. There is not any doubt in the world that under similar circumstances the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. GOOD, then held that an amendment in the nature of a new paragraph must not only be germane to the bill but it must be an amendment to some paragraph, and it must be germane as an amendment to that paragraph. I was of the opinion at the time that the Chair's ruling was incorrect. But it seems to me that the proper practices of the House require that the decisions of the various Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole should be uniform with respect to the application of this rule, whatever it is.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in this connection, not only because it is an interesting parliamentary proposition, but because I was concerned with the very case to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers. The chairman in that case did inadvertently lay down the principle referred to, but I call the attention of the present occupant of the chair to the fact that later the Chairman said that he would recognize me to offer my amendment as a separate section at the end of the bill. This by implication, conceded the whole principle for which I was contending. I submit that if an amendment is in order as a separate section, not on the ground that it is germane to some particular section of the bill, but because it is germane to the bill as a whole, such an amendment as a separate section may be offered as well in one part of a bill, as another. An amendment germane to a bill as a whole, but hardly germane to any one section may be offered at an appropriate place, with notice of motion to strike out following sections which it supersedes. Hinds' V section 5823. If an amendment is germane to one, or more sections, it must be offered to the one to which it is most germane. If that section has not been reached, the amendment must be postponed, until it is reached. If it has been passed, the mover has lost his opportunity, and the amendment can not be offered at all. The opportunity has passed. But if the amendment is not germane to one section, any more than to another but is plainly germane to the bill, it may follow any section, as a separate section.

I have seen amendments offered as separate sections in this body, or in the House, and heard the rulings on the same, to the effect just stated, unless I am greatly mistaken. But apart from the precedents, if there be any to the contrary, an amendment not germane to any particular section, but germane to the bill, must of reason be in order at the conclusion of any section, as an additional section. It would not be in order upon the facts supposed, to any particular section, since it would not be germane to such section.

I wish to say by way of emphasizing the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, who preceded me, that sound parliamentary construction must of necessity derive the conclusion that, if there is such a thing as adding an amendment to a bill on the ground that it is germane to the general purposes of the bill, it may be added at one place as well as at another if it is offered as a separate section, and not as an amendment to some particular section. It frequently occurs that an amendment which is submitted is not germane to any noticeable degree to any particular section, but is plainly germane to the general purpose of the bill. In such a situation the instant inquiry is, At what point in the bill shall the amendment be offered? Undertaking to reply to this query, I maintain that unless it is permitted to be offered at any point, it can not be offered at all, and surely the latter conclusion must be rejected. Upon what principle should any particular point have the preference? And if no particular point is entitled to preferential consideration, and the amendment is germane to the bill, and therefore proper to be considered, it may follow any section as a new section.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I had not thought that it would be necessary to stand before this committee and make a fight for securing the insertion of the amendment which I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to a discussion of the point of order.

Mr. JUUL. I will, and this is by way of introduction, Mr. Chairman. But I find, Mr. Chairman, by looking in the hearings of the Committee on Agriculture on this very identical subject, that the committee thought the subject was absolutely germane in that it devoted quite a bit of its time to its discussion. If I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, I will read a few lines of the hearings that will show that the committee thought the subject germane enough to take up in the committee and discuss the very identical phase of the situation which I am trying to bring before this body.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear any argument as to whether the amendment is germane to the bill. The Chair is satisfied with the question as to whether it is germane to the bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to submit to the Chair and emphasize the position taken by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], that the inevitable logic of the position taken by the gentleman from Minnesota is that there could not be a new paragraph added to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair stated in the preceding ruling that the rule governing germaneness of amendments required that amendments be not only germane to the bill but to the section under consideration. This amendment is offered as a new section and stands not in the same relationship as if it were an amendment to the section itself. The ruling referred to some time ago referred to the question of whether, when debate had been closed on a section and all amendments thereto, it would cover a new section that was added or sought to be added, and the ruling of the Chair was to the effect that it would. However, the Chair does not think that that is on a parity with this. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is germane to the bill if added as a new section. It is not a part of the preceding section and does not need to be germane to it, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLING. As I understand, the amendment which is now pending and held in order proposes to insert a new section, 11 (a), at the end of line 18, page 7. I submit that it seems to me that that is an entirely improper place to place a new section, because it is right in the center of what is now section 11 of the bill, and it ought not to be placed there.

The CHAIRMAN. It is offered at the end of the section and should be placed in the proper place. It should follow section 11.

Mr. WELLING. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he offer to amend his motion to insert it at the end of line 25, on page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the proponent of the amendment may alter it so as to read (c), at the end of section 11, and make it section 12 instead of section 11.

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the section.

Mr. HAUGEN. I want to dispose of the section so that we can make some progress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. We have passed the other section.

Mr. RAKER. Not yet.

Mr. ANDERSON. A new section has been offered.

Mr. RAKER. That has been offered in the meantime.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that this is a new section.

Mr. RAKER. The Chair does not hold that we have disposed of section 11?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. You can not offer it to the exclusion of gentleman who are seeking to amend the section.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I listened attentively to the gentleman from Illinois, and he sought to insert it after line 18, at the end of section 11.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to have the parliamentary situation clear, that we may have the right to offer an amendment to this section after we have disposed of this. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his amendment to the section. We have not had any time on section (c).

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, let the time be limited to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate be limited to 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does that apply to section 11?

The CHAIRMAN. To section 11 and amendments thereto.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And a separate section offered by the gentleman. I think that ought to be put in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it will cover the section. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, do I understand the Chair to hold that while a new section is pending and has been offered that you can proceed to offer amendments to the preceding section, when the new section is not offered as an amendment to the preceding section?

The CHAIRMAN. If the section has been passed by the offering of a new section, you can not go back to the section passed without unanimous consent to offer an amendment. The Chair states that if the section is under consideration and a motion is made to close debate upon the section, that that would cover also the new section that followed, according to the rulings heretofore.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Would it be in order, then, before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] proceeded with his amendment, to offer an amendment to section 11 and have it take precedence over his motion?

The CHAIRMAN. If it is a perfecting amendment, it must be offered.

Mr. RAKER. It is a perfecting amendment.

I move to strike out the word "report," in line 24, page 7, and insert the word "report," after the word "fraudulent," in the same line.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request before the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California to offer his amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Strike out the word "report," in line 24, page 7, and insert the word "report," after the word "fraudulent," in line 24, the same page.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 7, line 24, after the word "any," strike out the word "report," and after the word "fraudulent," in the same line, insert the word "report."

Mr. RAKER. Now, if I may be heard on my amendment——

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is an amendment pending.

Mr. RAKER. This is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. WELLING. The amendment does not touch the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman was to go in with his amendment between section (a) and before section (b)——

The CHAIRMAN. If he is placing it between two paragraphs, it is out of order. It goes at the end of section 11. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to understand the situation. Do I understand now that the Chair rules that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] is not in order at the place where he offered it?

The CHAIRMAN. He can offer it as a new section following section 11.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then it was not in order where it was offered before?

The CHAIRMAN. It was in order as a new section. As to where the gentleman placed it, the Chair is not aware.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the reason I moved to strike out the word "report" and insert it after the word "fraudulent" is this: The gentleman from Michigan makes no objection, which is all right. It will read as follows:

That no person shall willfully fail or refuse to make any required report or return or make any false or fraudulent report in any material particular.

That is the language. You have got to make it "false and fraudulent." So it must say that "no person shall willfully fail or refuse to make any false or fraudulent report."

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman explain the difference to me?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Inasmuch as the gentleman quoted me, he ought to quote me properly. I disagree with the amendment altogether.

Mr. RAKER. I will read it again.

No person shall willfully fail or refuse to—

And then go down to line 24—

Make any report false or fraudulent.

Mr. ANDERSON. "Fail" or "refuse" has nothing to do with "false" or "fraudulent." It says if any person shall 'refuse" to make any report.

This is another proposition, "or make reports false or fraudulent in any material particular."

Mr. RAKER. Going back to the subject, "No person shall willfully"—and there you have one; that is the first one—"fail or refuse to make full and true entries" under this section.

Now, second, "alter, mutilate, conceal, or destroy any such account or record," or, going back to the beginning, "No person shall willfully fail or refuse to make any report false or fraudulent in any material particular."

You can not construe the language in any other way. It is just the transposition of the words, and the word "report" ought to be inserted in the other place. In other words, it is provided here that "if a man does not make a false and fraudulent report" he is guilty of an offense. Clearly the committee does not intend that. I do not really understand why these figures (1), (2), and (3) are there, but they may be all right.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I think the interpretation that the gentleman from California is placing on this language, while of course it is not what the committee had in mind, is a fair interpretation of the language itself. But it seems to me that difficulty could very readily be removed if you simply transposed those sentences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Oh, no. I am recognized in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not do that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But I asked for recognition in my own time when the gentleman from California took his seat.

Mr. HAUGEN. The time is limited to 20 minutes, with the understanding that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] should have 5 minutes each, and I have 5 minutes. How much time does the gentleman from Virginia want?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will be through in a minute.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will yield to the gentleman half of my time.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I suggest if you transpose this sentence so that it will read this way, "No person shall willfully make any report false or fraudulent in any material particular or fail or refuse to make any required report or return," you solve the difficulty and make the meaning clear.

I offer as a substitute to strike out the figure "(3)" and the language at the conclusion of the sentence and substitute the language that I have offered. I think it will carry out the idea of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has used one minute. The amendment will be read for information.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. My amendment is offered as a substitute. It is not to be read for information, but it is offered in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: Page 7, line 23, after the semicolon, strike out the balance of the language in lines 23, 24, and 25 and insert "or (3) make any report false or fraudulent in any material particular or fail or refuse to make any required report or return."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. JUUL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentlemen who are opposed to the amendment which I have offered referred to experts who appeared before the committee. I was not in the committee, but I find on page 87 of the committee hearings that Dr. Wiley, one of the experts, and Dr. Pennington, another of the experts, spoke on the very subject of poultry being drawn or undrawn. Dr. Wiley said:

Ordinarily they are put in storage in an undrawn condition, and there is a dispute as to whether that is better. You know what undrawn means; it means that the entrails have not been taken out. And whether it is better to put them up in an undrawn condition or not there is some dispute. My belief is that they ought to be put up drawn; but that is neither here nor there.

That is the expert testimony as to what ought to be done, and with that expert testimony, introduced by my friend, the chairman of the committee, I rest my case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the gentleman think the refrigerator people will object to that?

Mr. JUUL. I think the refrigerator people will object to that, and that is what we are up against on this floor—the filthy habit of storing such poultry for years and selling it to poor people when it is decayed and black with the filth that is stored inside of it. I have been trying to find out all afternoon whether it is "either here or there" and why there is such friendship manifested here for poultry put up in such a condition.

Mr. CONNALLY. The storage men would probably object to it?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I want to ask the gentleman, if his amendment should be adopted, what would become of the gizzards and the livers?

Mr. JUUL. I do not know of what value the gizzard or liver, or for that matter the neck, is in a poor chicken. I know a story of a boy of 14 who up to that time had been obliged to eat at the second table when the family had chicken for dinner, and under those circumstances his notion of a chicken was that there was nothing to it but the neck. [Laughter.] I would rather sacrifice the gizzard and liver, and even the neck, than compel the people in my district to eat the rotten stuff they have to eat. I hope you gentlemen will help me purify the situation. That is all I have got to say. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELL. In the first place, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the question was just asked about the livers of the chickens and what became of them. The same thing can be done with them as is done with cod livers. When a cod is caught he is not put into the ice box whole. His insides are taken out and thrown overboard, and his liver is put in a separate box. In the case of chicken livers the same thing could be done. Instead of their being left in cold storage to rot next to the other entrails they could be very readily put away separately and stored separately and marked as such.

We have heard that the expert says that it matters little whether or not poultry is drawn before being put in cold storage. It does not. When a chicken is put in ice and is frozen and you can take it out and cook it immediately, it will be just as good whether it has been drawn or not drawn. But what actually does happen is that it is taken out and kept some little time after it is taken from the ice box, and cold-storage food, though just as good, rots very much more rapidly than fresh food.

For that reason I think the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] should be passed. I think we ought not to rely too much on expert testimony. We can use our own common sense. There is not one man here who really would like to have a chicken served to him which has been dead for two or three years, or even one year, as this bill allows, and left with all its insides in it.

Ordinary common sense will show us that this amendment will probably do a great deal of good, and so far nobody has made the slightest suggestion that this provision will do any harm. We say that it will be a good thing for the food of the people; that it will be in the interest of health. Those who oppose it say merely that this guaranty is not necessary, or that it is not at the proper page of the bill. We are talking about the subject matter in hand. I think it will be a good thing to guarantee the people against the possibility of rotten food. [Applause.]

Chickens are sold by the pound. You buy them at such and such a price per pound. That includes these insides which must be thrown away. It seems to me that is a swindle.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PELL. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it is within the jurisdiction of the pure-food law to regulate this, instead of the cold-storage bill?

Mr. PELL. Obviously it is not regulated now; and I think it is our business to see that it is done as quickly as possible. If this were a pure-food law I should introduce it on that, but as it is a cold-storage law and it has been held to be germane to it, I think this perfectly good reform should be adopted without waiting for a more elegant or suitable vehicle.

Mr. CLEARY. Does not the gentleman think it is foolish to pay storage on entrails?

Mr. PELL. I think so.

Mr. CLEARY. That makes an extra charge for storing something that is no good.

Mr. PELL. Yes; and in toto it amounts to a good deal of money.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this bill nowhere has any section or portion which seeks to control or have anything to do with the condition in which food is put into or taken out of cold storage. If this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], should be adopted, it would be a departure from the general plan of the bill, and I think for that reason it ought not to be adopted. The question was asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] if this was not opposed by the packers, and the answer was yes; and he insinuated that of course the Committee on Agriculture would not recommend it. We expect such nasty reflections from some people outside, but we do not expect our own Members to be casting such reflections upon us, as they are altogether undeserved, and I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas has indulged in remarks of that kind. I know of no committee, in the consideration of any measure, that has been more free from prejudice or influence than has the Committee on Agriculture in the consideration of this proposition. I defy anyone to find anything that has been said or done on this floor respecting these matters that will justify any such reflection as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] would cast upon us.

I am in sympathy with the idea advanced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], that chickens ought to be drawn, that they are not as good and do not keep as well when they are not drawn; but this bill does not relate to those matters. The pure-food law does relate to them, and when any article of food offered for sale or consumption is found to be in an unwholesome condition, such control as the Federal Government has over it is found in the pure-food law. That law covers the proposition, and it seems to me we ought not to include it in this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Before the gentleman takes his seat I want to ask a question about this section 11. The section provides for a report from storage warehouses, which, of course, is all right, but what sort of a report is to be made by refrigerator vehicles? I can not see when they would make a report. That stuff is carried in transit in refrigerator vehicles.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The testimony is that altogether there is an immense amount of foodstuffs in transit in refrigerator cars every day, and if we can get reports on the total amount in transit on any one day it will be very helpful to the business of the country and in the administration of this act.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Refrigerator vehicles are required to make reports as to the stuff in transit on a particular day.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. On a certain day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The parliamentary situation is that a new section is offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], to which an amendment is offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and a substitute by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. The question is first on the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the section as amended by the offering of the new section of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is that the parliamentary situation? The gentleman from Illinois does not offer any amendment to the section. He offers a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. He offers it as a new section. The question is on the new section.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan) there were—ayes 22, noes 19.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 16 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That no person shall willfully hinder, obstruct, or resist the Secretary of Agriculture or any duly authorized officer, employee, or agent thereof in the performance of his duties under this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "willfully" in line 1, page 8, and in line 2 the word "duly."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 8, line 1, strike out the word "willfully" and in line 2 the word "duly."

Mr. RAKER. I should like to ask the gentleman the real purpose of the word "duly"? A man is authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to do a certain act.

Mr. HAUGEN. "Duly" means in writing.

Mr. RAKER. It does not say so.

Mr. HAUGEN. It does in another section.

Mr. RAKER. No one would be able to act for the Secretary unless it was authorized in writing. Any obstruction or hindering of the Secretary of Agriculture, unless willful, would be all right.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the way it is worded. It would be rather harsh language to leave that word out.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not intended that anybody who would hinder or obstruct the Secretary of Agriculture ought to be sufficiently——

Mr. HAUGEN. I think it does little harm to leave it in. It does not make it quite so drastic as it would to leave it out.

Mr. RAKER. The Chairman thinks it would be better to make it a willful act on the part of anyone to obstruct or hinder the Secretary, and that any general obstruction would not mean anything unless willfully intended to oppose the enforcement of the law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That any person who violates any provision of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, or 18 of this act, or any regulations prescribed thereunder, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both. After judgment of any court with respect to any violation of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture may give notice thereof by publication in such manner as he by regulation may prescribe. It shall not be deemed a violation of any provision of sections 3, 4, 5, or 6, if the act, omission, or failure of any person results from his reliance in good faith upon the act, omission, or failure of any other person with respect to marks or absence of marks upon the article of fool or container thereof.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 17, after the words "article of," strike out the word "fool" and insert in lieu thereof the word "food."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 7, strike out the words "or any regulation prescribed thereunder."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that certain punishment shall result from the violation of regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The law provides that any person who violates any provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 18 of the act shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not more than one year, or both.

It seems to me that we ought not to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make regulations for the violation of which a man may be punished by a fine of $1,000 or sent to prison for one year or both fine and imprisonment. Is it not enough to impose a penalty on the man for the violation of the law? What right have we to suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture might not make such regulations as to make it impossible for anybody to comply with them. Why should we give him any such power? Why should we make it possible for any man to be convicted for the violation of regulations made by any man occupying an administrative position in the Government of the United States?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Did the gentleman ever vote for any measure of that kind?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe I ever did with my eyes open.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The books are full of them.

Mr. MADDEN. If they are it is all a mistake. I do not think we ought to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to make a law the violation of which would send a man to the penitentiary. That is what this is.

Mr. TINCHER. Would the gentleman favor a punishment for a violation of the regulations?

Mr. MADDEN. The bill imposes a punishment for the violation of the law.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman opposed to allowing the Secretary of Agriculture to make regulations?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I am in favor of his making them, but the punishment ought to be only for the violation of the law.

Mr. TINCHER. The law says what regulations he can make.

Mr. MADDEN. The law says nothing of the kind; it says any regulations prescribed hereunder.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman is reading that part which pertains to the penalty.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I would not permit the punishment of any man for violating any regulation made by an officer of the Government.

Mr. TINCHER. What would the gentleman do?

Mr. MADDEN. I would punish him for a violation of the law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will say this, that if the Secretary of Agriculture is not given authority to make regulations under this law, we might as well throw this whole thing into the wastebasket. Some regulations are just as important as matters specified in the law itself.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not opposed to the Secretary of Agriculture being given the power to make regulations, but I am opposed to any regulations made by him having such force of law as will permit the punishment of some one who violates it. He may make the regulation properly, or he may make a regulation improperly and may make one perfectly improper, and if he does and some one violates it, is there any reason in the world why that one should be sent to the penitentiary because the Secretary of Agriculture says so?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on the section and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RICKETTS. I object, Mr. Chairman, to that.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would like to submit to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RICKETTS: Page 8, line 8, after the word "fine," strike out "not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not more than one year or both" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "not less than $1,000 or imprisonment for one year, or not more than $5,000 or imprisonment not more than five years."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request to close debate in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture how long he expects to run this evening?

Mr. HAUGEN. I expect to move to rise after we get through with this section.

Mr. MADDEN. After 10 minutes?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, after the vote?

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the real purpose and intent of this bill, as I gather from a close reading of it, is to protect the people of this country from the high cost of living. There is a general feeling throughout the country that the people of the country have been imposed upon by the packers, and that the packers have been storing foodstuffs of this country for a great length of time, or for such time as to defeat completely the law of supply and demand, and I think there is more truth in that than we credit. I have felt all the time up to now during the consideration of this bill that each of the Members of this House are not considering the bill as seriously, or in the light that we should, and I am not criticizing anybody, because I can see clearly that the penalty imposed by this statute will have little or no remedial effect. I heard it said on the floor of the House this morning by the gentleman from Illinois that fresh meats were purchased in the cities, towns, and villages of this country at the meat markets. Why, gentlemen of the committee, let me tell you something: Since 1908 the meat markets in the villages, cities, and towns of this country have been gradually put out of business; I mean those markets where fresh meats have been sold during that time. The packers of the country could undersell the fellows who undertook to slaughter their own beef, hogs, and sheep, and made prices so low, for a number of years, as to put the ordinary butcher and meat-market men out of business; and I know whereof I speak with reference to that matter. Now, what happened after they had gotten rid of the man who slaughtered his own meat and sold fresh meat to the people from the meat markets in the villages, towns, or cities? Why, instead of that, the meat men who were engaged in that business were forced to buy their meats from the packers or discontinue their business. They do not undertake to stock their markets wholly with fresh meats. They can not do it. They purchase a great portion of the meat from the packers, and the result is that the packers of the country since 1908 have been controlling the markets of this country with reference to the production of cattle, sheep, and hogs, and they have been able, by reason of the fact of storing great quantities of meat in the cold-storage houses of the country, to control the supply of the country in that line, and they have been able, if you please, on that same theory, to regulate the market price of meats in the country, and they have been able to make the farmers of the country believe that if Congress should pass a law whereby the packers of the country would be controlled in their business, that the farmers in the country are going to lose their market for their stock upon the farms. A great many farmers believe that; but such is not the case. The farmers will profit by this measure, for they will have an open market, and not one controlled by monopoly.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICKETTS. I will in just a minute. What I want to say is this: I gave this question of cold storage considerable study in July of this year and I addressed this House on that subject, and when I hear you say here that you can get fresh meat in Washington I want you to point out, if you can, where? You Members of the House, point out any place in the great Capital City of Washington where you can buy fresh meats? It can not be done, and every man in this House knows it. I submit that the people of this city, including Members of Congress, are required to subsist upon meats obtained from cold storage. In fact, 75 per cent of the foodstuffs used by the people of this city are obtained from cold storage. I know of no other city in the country where the people are required to such an extent to live upon foodstuffs secured from cold storage. Many of us have had the sad experience of having been served with tainted foodstuffs and stale eggs during even this session of Congress. The fact is that never before in the history of this Nation have the people generally been required to purchase such great quantities of cold-storage foods for consumption. They have been paying the highest prices for these articles ever before paid by the citizens of this country. The people are looking to Congress for relief and the Committee on Agriculture has presented this bill for our consideration. They have held hearings and discussed this matter fully in committee, and it is clearly the purpose and intention of the Committee on Agriculture, by the presentation of this bill, to prevent hoarding and deterioration of, and deception with respect to cold-storage foods; to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and to limit the time that meats and all other foodstuffs, except liquid foods, shall be kept in cold storage.

Section 9 of this bill provides:

It shall be unlawful for any person to ship or deliver for shipment in commerce, or hold in cars while in commerce, or sell or offer for sale in commerce, or having received from shipment in commerce, to sell or offer for sale in the original, unbroken package, any article of food which has been in cold storage after the expiration of 12 months following the date on which the article of food was first placed in cold storage; except cheese held for the purpose of ripening and improving the quality thereof.

And section 13 prescribes the penalty of a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not more than one year, or both.

Gentlemen of the House, I am frank to say to you that this penalty is entirely inadequate. The force and effect of a remedial statute depends upon the penalty, and I am quite convinced that the penalty provided for herein will not insure the results which the committee hoped to obtain under this legislation. Those inclined to monopolize the foodstuffs of the country will not be deterred or dissuaded by this penalty.

This legislation has a twofold object. First, to reduce the high cost of living. And second, to insure sanitary foods to the people of the country as a public-health measure.

Many poor people in this country are to-day suffering for the want of sufficient wholesome food, and the lack of pure wholesome food is not due to a scarcity of foodstuffs. The reports of the Bureau of Markets and the report of the investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission, together with the evidence presented to the committee in the hearings on this bill, show conclusively that immense quantities of all kinds of foodstuffs have been held in cold storage for many months past, and withheld by the packers from the markets of the country. This is, indeed, a deplorable condition, and because of this fact the President, in his recent message, recommended to Congress that this legislation be enacted, and that, in addition thereto, the Lever Food-Control Act be amended, which has already been done by this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I think the attention of the proponent of this amendment should be called to this amendment, in that it provides a double penalty.

Mr. RICKETTS. The amendment was drawn very hastily and it might be that it needs perfecting.

Mr. GARD. I suggest that the gentleman had better fix it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICKETTS: Page 8, line 8, after the word "fine," strike out "not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not more than one year or both" and insert in lieu thereof "not less than $1,000 or imprisonment for one year or not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Should not the amendment be corrected, since he has a double penalty in the amendment for the same thing?

Mr. RICKETTS. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman, if he will suggest his amendment I will accept it, because I want it in correct form.

Mr. GARD. I suggest to the gentleman that in lieu of the language he has chosen to put in that it should read "not to exceed $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both," or whatever the gentleman wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be in order if the gentleman will present it.

Mr. RICKETTS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to correct my amendment.

Mr. GARD. I think the amendment may be corrected by striking out the first few words he has in his last insertion there.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be offered.

Mr. RICKETTS. I am certainly under obligations to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask that the committee permit the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to proceed while this amendment is being corrected. If there is no objection, the gentleman from California will proceed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER: Page 8, line 9, after the word "both," strike out the rest of the line and all of lines 10, 11, and of 12 to and including the word "prescribe."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a most unusual provision. Here is a man or an association that, being found guilty in a criminal court by fine or judgment, which would be the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court following, the Secretary of Agriculture shall publish and make provision for the publication of that judgment. Evidently there can be no purpose. I do not understand the reason the committee has for it, because in all criminal proceedings in the State and Federal courts are of public record, and why should the money of the Department of Agriculture be used for publishing the fact that a judgment has been secured? I yield to the Chairman for an answer to that. What is the purpose of that provision?

Mr. HAUGEN. This was drawn in line with the pure food act, and has proven very effective. For that reason it was inserted in this bill, that he may give publicity to it; and it may save a good deal of litigation after it is known that publicity will be given to it.

Mr. MADDEN. You mean it will ruin a man's business.

Mr. HAUGEN. It will ruin him less than by hauling him into court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment of Mr. RICKETTS: Page 8, line 8, after the word "fine," strike out "not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both," and insert "not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote now goes on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WELLING. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman, before we leave this section.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to rise takes precedence of everything else.

Mr. WELLING. I understood we amended this bill by adding section 11 (a). The penalties are only applied to those sections that are named in the bill. I want to ask the Chair if he would hold that section 11 (a) is covered by the penalty that we have already adopted in connection with this section, without an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The new section is not a part of the section which precedes it.

Mr. WELLING. I move to amend section 13.

The CHAIRMAN. It is out of order. A motion to rise has been made.

Mr. WELLING. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLING. There was a motion adopted that we should debate this section for 10 minutes, but it did not provide that other amendments should not be in order without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. The motion is that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9521, the cold-storage bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MACGREGOR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of committee work.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ASHBROOK, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mary A. Nichols (H. R. 3573, 65th Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold his motion for a moment, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 30, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to the duties of each day with a clearer vision of its importance and with a firmer grasp upon its duties after we have lifted our hearts to Thee and asked Thy guidance and blessing. Thou are the God of all the nations. Thou hast held us in the hollow of Thy hand. Thou hast led our fathers as Thou hast led us. Grant us to-day Thy grace for the discharge of the duties of this high office. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2910. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild, reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee"; and

H. J. Res. 208. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHIPPS. I have received from the Secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, of Boston, Mass., a letter answering statements made in a telegram from W. A. Snyder, of Denver, Colo., relative to wool importation from Great Britain, which telegram was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 22. I ask that the letter may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOOL MANUFACTURERS,
Boston, Mass., September 26, 1919.

Hon. L. C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Concerning the matter of the importation of Australasian wools, it seems to us necessary to correct several misstatements made in the telegram received by you from W. A. Snyder, of Denver, Colo., and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. As a matter of justice and fairness, we believe you ought to give to this correction the same treatment that you gave to the telegram. The principal points of error to which we call attention are the following:

1. The proposed shipment of Australasian wools to the United States is not an attempt on the part of England to dump wools here. It is a concession granted at the request of American manufacturers to supply a limited quantity of certain types of wool absolutely necessary for the continuation of production of fabrics, which wools are not available in domestic stocks and will not be available from the current domestic clip.

2. The amount mentioned in the telegram (namely, 50,000,000 pounds) is incorrect. The quantity which has been arranged for to sell in the United States in December (not November, as indicated in the telegram) is 50,000 bales, or approximately 15,000,000 pounds, instead of 50,000,000.

3. This amount will not have the effect of demoralizing prices of wool, because the demand for this type of wool is so much greater than the supply available.

4. The statement of the amount of wool stocks on hand apparently is taken from the Department of Agriculture figures for June 30, 1919, without regard to changes in stocks since that time, and also without regard to the quality of wool in stock. Of the total amount thus indicated, only about 254,000,000 pounds were of three-eighths blood or better. This is an amount entirely inadequate to supply the requirements of the mills for fine wools, and the amount of wools of this type in the domestic clip for this year will come far short of fulfilling the necessary requirements.

5. In order to keep the cost of cloth within reasonable limits, it is absolutely necessary to avoid any danger of shortage of fine wools such as would inevitably follow from the failure to secure an ample supply of wools of this kind from the one available source, namely, Australasia.

Respectfully,
PAUL T. CHERINGTON,
Secretary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I present a resolution adopted by James Connolly Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of New York City, N. Y., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FRIENDS OF IRISH FREEDOM,
New York, September 26, 1919.

At a regular business meeting of the above branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, held at the Valcour Club, 1904 Bathgate Avenue, The Bronx, September 17, the following resolutions were proposed and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we, the members of the James Connolly Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, in meeting assembled, do hereby protest with all the power within us against ratification of that deadly menace to our Nation, our liberty, and our homes—that iniquity born of darkness and deceit, European selfishness, and juggling—the 'league of nations.'

"Resolved, That we further protest against it as true Americans who feel that their beloved country should not be a tail to no European kite, who would give and have given the last drop of blood in their veins to defend that country's honor, and who will make the same sacrifices again, if needful, to preserve that country from dangerous European alliances; and who further protest most emphatically against ratification in any shape or form of 'article 10' in said league, feeling it to be a most sinister movement aimed at robbing once more American motherhood of those near and dear to them in the person of their growing sons, to pay the price in blood and tears for Europe's 'secret treaties' and 'right by might' conquest of small and weak nations."

Vice President.

The communication is from the president of the Newton Theological Institution, the religious educational center of the Baptist Churches of Massachusetts. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH: I have the honor of transmitting to you the following resolution, unanimously adopted by the faculty and students of the Newton Theological Institution, Newton Center, Mass., September 23, 1919:

"In the interest of the organized peace of the world we urge our Representatives in the United States Senate not to imperil the league of nations by adopting amendments which will necessitate a reopening of peace negotiations. Whatever the defects of the proposed league, they can be remedied in the light of experience. It is time to make an experiment in human brotherhood."

Respectfully, yours,

GEORGE EDWIN HORR.

LANDING OF MARINES IN DALMATIA.

Mr. NEW. If it is in order at this time, I ask for the consideration of Senate resolution 198, which was submitted yesterday and went over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 198, submitted yesterday by Mr. NEW, as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the newspapers of this date that a force of American sailors or marines were landed on the Dalmatian coast from a vessel of the United States Navy by direction of the British Admiralty and without the knowledge of the President, the Secretary of the United States Navy, or other competent authority of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to inform the Senate of the facts concerning this report at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Norris	Ransdell	Sterling	Warren

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained from the Senate on official business. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which has heretofore been read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana why he addresses this resolution to the Secretary of State? If the resolution is proper at all—and I suppose it is proper if the Senate wants to keep picking away at these things—I would ask why the Senator does not address the resolution to the President of the United States, as he is involved in this matter?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have addressed the resolution to the Department of State as being the department of the Government which is supposed to have information about such matters, if anyone has any information these days about what is being done with American troops. I thought the resolution was addressed to the proper authority, and I still think so. However, I have no objection to modifying the resolution so that it shall be addressed to the President, if it would be more acceptable to the Senator from Nebraska in that form.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The subject of the resolution involves the Secretary of the Navy; the Senator's inquiry makes it involve the Secretary of State; it also involves the President of the United States by mentioning him in the preamble; and it seems to me, under those circumstances, it clearly ought to go to the President of the United States.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I have no objection to the resolution going to the President. I had supposed, however, and I still suppose, that the Department of State was the department of the Government charged with the duty and responsibility of collecting such evidence as that for which the resolution calls.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. If I mistake not, all inquiries for information from the Secretary of State are addressed to the President, the President being the head of foreign affairs and the Secretary of State reporting to him. If I am in error in that statement, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] will correct me. I think that all inquiries, by way of resolution, of the State Department have heretofore been addressed to the President.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the practice has been both ways. Practically, it is a request to the President, even though it goes to the Secretary of State, as the President decides the question as to whether or not it is compatible with the public interest to make the reply. So in any form it is in effect a request of the President. It only goes around through the Department of State.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest that the resolution be amended so as to go directly to the President. I think that would be better.

Mr. NEW. I will accept that amendment, if it is suggested as an amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest it as an amendment.

Mr. NEW. I accept the amendment.

Mr. KNOX. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana also to insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest," because that is the form usually followed.

Mr. NEW. I accept that suggestion also.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as modified, so far as I am concerned, there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution. I think, however, it is rather discreditable to the Senate of the United States to be forever prodding the administration about these matters, which are necessarily routine and within the jurisdiction of the President under present war conditions. It is just as reasonable for the United States at the present time, under the decisions of the supreme council, to land marines on Austrian territory as it is for us to hold soldiers on German territory, and there is no more reason for inquiring into one than there is for inquiring into the other; but if the Senator wishes to get the information I am perfectly willing to have him get it.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I think it is discreditable rather that so many occasions arise to make these inquiries necessary. I think that the people of the United States are interested in knowing just what are the facts behind the landing of armed American forces on the coast of a country with which we are presumably at peace. The resolution calls for that information and for nothing more.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, to what does the Senator refer when he says "a country with which we are at peace"?

Mr. NEW. We are not at war with Italy and have never been at war with Italy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is not Italian soil.

Mr. NEW. Nor have we been at war with Serbia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But this is not Serbian soil.

Mr. NEW. It is Dalmatia; and we are not at war with Dalmatia, and have not been.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is Austrian soil.

Mr. NEW. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And we are just as much at war with Austria as we are with Germany. Now we are on German soil with our Army for temporary purposes. Why should not our marines be on Austrian soil? The Senator may be laboring under the delusion that this is Italian soil, but it is not Italian soil.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, our troops were landed there to interfere with the nationals of a country with which we are not only at peace, but with which we have been associated in the war which has just come to a close. I can see no possible objection to furnishing to the Congress of the United States and, through it, to the people of the United States the facts which are sought to be obtained by the resolution. If the Senator has no further objection to interpose, I should like to have the resolution adopted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no objection to the resolution, if Senators are willing to father a constant reiteration of annoying and unnecessary proddings of an administration which is doing the best it can under serious circumstances. The Senator would be just as much justified in demanding of the President to know why our soldiers are on the bridgeheads of the Rhine. They are there for necessary war purposes; they are there for the purpose of preserving the peace; and in this case, on Austrian soil, they are there to endeavor to prevent insurrectionary and lawless conflicts between the Jugo-Slavs and the Italians. The Senator knows that such outbreaks would be disastrous and might result in setting on fire again the material which has only recently been saved from the disasters of war. Now, if the Senator wants to go on, he will get the information from the President; he will get the information which he ought to know now, that this is Austrian soil; that there is danger there of race conflict between Italians and Jugo-Slavs, and that American marines are there in performance of the policy of the supreme war council which has been in effect since the armistice was signed, and are there for the purpose of preserving order until by peaceful methods the settlement of the war can be brought about.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I really do not think that the Senator from Indiana has deserved the severe rebuke he has received from the Senator from Nebraska; nor do I think that it is quite fair or quite in accordance with the facts to charge Senators upon this side with undertaking to heckle the administration in connection with this war or anything that has grown out of the war. I do not think there has ever been a more splendid illustration of the absence of partisanship and the presence of a high-minded attitude toward the projects of the administration connected with the war than the Republican Party and the Democratic Party in the Senate have shown during this war. It is a mistake upon the part of the Senator from Nebraska to say that we have habitually been landing marines; that there has hardly been an administration during which marines have not been landed in Central and South America.

The Senator from Nebraska overlooks the significant fact that in the past wherever we have landed American marines or wherever we have sent the American Army or the American Navy we have sent them to defend the lives and property of American citizens. This thing stands out by itself. It may be a necessary outcome of the war. It may be that these marines were landed under sufficient authority. If that is true, it is likely to be repeated again and again before this great conflict has been finally closed; and if that is likely to occur, it seems to me that the Senator from Nebraska should welcome the opportunity to have laid before the Senate and before the people, for the first and probably necessarily for the last time, a full explanation of the reasons and the circumstances and the conditions under which it may recur.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. I have heard the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania. It seems to me that this is the state of facts with reference to Dalmatia:

The war against Austria was progressing. There was a collapse of the Austrian Empire. Certain territory on the Adriatic was taken over by the allied powers. Certain territory was assigned, with the agreement of the Italian Government, for the supervision and control of the troops of the United States, with her authority. I should like to ask the Senator if he is willing, under an obligation like that, the promise of the Italian Government, this territory having been turned over to the jurisdiction of the United States until peace is made and the treaty ratified, for the United States troops to be driven out in violation of a contract and in violation of this obligation?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana will permit me——

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. As far as the Senator from Pennsylvania is concerned he has not raised any such question. We can not take the word of the Senator from Virginia about these international matters. I will take his word personally for anything that he may choose to give it for, but we are entitled to have the information directly.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senator, under a state of facts like that, is he willing for the flag of the United States to be driven out without consulting its Government?

Mr. KNOX. I want to know what are the facts.

Mr. SWANSON. I say, if those facts should be disclosed—and, as I understand, they have been disclosed; I think they were disclosed by the Secretary of the Navy to-day; I think that has been the understanding, that a certain part of the Adriatic was turned over to Italy and a certain part to the United States and a certain part to others to take care of pending a treaty of peace. I for one, as an American citizen loving the American flag, will never consent to have that flag, when it is put there properly under an agreement during war, driven out by anybody, if that state of facts exists.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if that state of facts exists, it is very evident from what the Secretary of the Navy said yesterday that he did not know it. So far as I am concerned, I should like to have the details of the agreement that is mentioned by the Senator from Virginia. Like the Senator from Pennsylvania, of course I am willing to take the word of the Senator from Virginia for almost anything, but I should like to have officially the facts about this agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the facts ought to be given officially.

Mr. NEW. That is what this resolution calls for.

Mr. SWANSON. I have not authoritative information; that is true; but what I protest against is condemning your own Navy and your own Government, before you get the facts, for what occurred yesterday. Anybody would have imagined yesterday, from the discussion in this Chamber and what has been given out, that the United States had declared war against Italy.

Mr. NEW. Why, Mr. President, I think the Senator will search in vain in the RECORD, either yesterday or to-day, for any word that was said by anybody on either side of this question that reflects upon the Navy of the United States or any official connected with the United States Government. The resolution asks for a plain statement of the facts as far as they can be revealed, and I think the Congress of the United States is entitled to them. I think the people of the United States are entitled to them. I am perfectly willing to father this resolution. If I had not been, I would not have introduced it. I think the time has come when the people of the United States should know the character of the agreement mentioned by the Senator from Virginia, if there is such a one. Let us know the facts. That is what this resolution calls for. Senators speak of an order having been issued by the supreme council. I think it would be well for us to know who our representative on the council is.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, here is what I am referring to:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?
Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.
Mr. LODGE. When did we go to war with Italy?
Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have not gone to war with Italy.
Mr. LODGE. It is the Italians that we drove out of Trau.

I can not draw any other deduction from that than that there was an impression on the mind of the senior Senator from Massachusetts that we had declared war against Italy. It would convey that impression to the country.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no, Mr. President, I never suggested that we had declared war against Italy. I said that we had been guilty of an act of war.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator wanted to know when we declared war against Italy.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say we declared war against Italy. Of course, that is too absurd.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator does not claim that this is a declaration of war by Congress, but that it is an act of war?

Mr. LODGE. I think it looks very much like it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator used this language:

When did we go to war with Italy?

That is the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; that is just what I mean, because we never have gone to war with Italy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Pennsylvania discussed an invasion, and the Senator from Massachusetts discussed going to war, whereas the fact was that our marines were landed on Austrian territory under an agreement with Italy, Great Britain, and France.

Mr. SWANSON. What I protest against——

Mr. LODGE. When was that agreement made, and who made it?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think I have the floor. What I protest against is that before you ascertain the facts, before you have this resolution of inquiry presented to the President, you condemn your own Government, and try to create friction abroad. Why did you not make the inquiry and learn the circumstances under which it was done before you commenced condemning it? All that we asked was that you should suspend your judgment until you got the facts, which you failed to do.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I want to get, and what I can not get from anybody on your side: Who made the agreement? When was it made?

Mr. SWANSON. What agreement?

Mr. LODGE. The agreement to land troops to protect the Dalmatian coast.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand—and I simply say this from general information derived at the time—when the arrangements were made for the Adriatic, certain territory was to be guarded by the United States, and certain territory was to be guarded by England and others. Now, I may not have accurate information; I do not speak authoritatively; but what I protest against is that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, while he is waiting for information which he can get if the resolution is passed, does not suspend his judgment, but condemns his own Government.

Mr. LODGE. I am not condemning my own Government. I want to know; that is all. I ask the Senator who made the agreement, and where was it made, and by whom?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator can get that information; but why did he not suspend judgment until the information came in, so as to see whether his judgment was right or not?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Virginia evidently has not got it himself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the agreement was the order of the supreme council, which is made unanimously, and the United States participates in it.

Mr. LODGE. I see.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows very well that since last November the supreme council has been in control of all of these territories, of the German territory as well as of the Austrian territory; and it does not make any difference whether, under the orders of the supreme council, military forces are used or naval forces. They are used by concurrence and agreement between the great nations that constitute the supreme council.

Mr. LODGE. Our forces are under the control of the supreme council?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just as those of Great Britain and France and Italy are, to the extent that Italy can control her own forces. The Senator knows that.

Mr. LODGE. They may or may not be; but I notice that it is the American ships that are ordered to the place.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, has the Senator from Massachusetts any information as to the composition of this supreme council, by what authority it was constituted, and who constitute it?

Mr. LODGE. I have none.

Mr. FALL. It seems to me that that is the first question to be answered. I should like to know if the Senator from Nebraska has any information on that point.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows how the supreme council was constituted.

Mr. FALL. I am asking the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was constituted by the nations that were associated in the war.

Mr. FALL. What nations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States.

Mr. FALL. Did the Senator assist in constituting it in any way?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did not. It was a war measure——

Mr. FALL. Who did?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And we are still under war conditions, as the Senator very well knows. No treaty of peace has been agreed to. The Senator goes on the theory that we are at peace. We are not at peace. We have stopped fighting; that is all. We are operating under an armistice, and during this temporary period between war and peace the supreme council must of necessity have control over the forces that are there keeping Germany in check and keeping Austria-Hungary in check.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will yield to me, getting back to my question, who are the supreme council, and how were they constituted, and who are they? Who constitutes the supreme council now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are constituted by the war powers of the nations that were associated in the war; and the supreme council will be there, and will be in control of the situation, until this treaty of peace is ratified.

Mr. FALL. I defy the Senator to name the American member of it. Who is he?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not going to name anything to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. The Senator does not know anything about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator can defy until he is black in the face; but he knows, and all the Senators know, who are here holding up this treaty and delaying its ratification by a systematic filibuster, in spite of the will of the people of the United States, that the supreme council exists in Europe, and will exist until the nations are at peace.

Mr. FALL. I do not know anything of the facts, and neither does the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator is worse off than I thought he was.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has been seeking information from just such sources as he is getting it from now, and he gets a stump speech whenever he asks for information.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator. He is very kind.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Indiana has the floor, as I understand.

Mr. NEW. I yield the floor.

Mr. FALL. I was trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. I simply wanted to ask the question which the Senator from New Mexico did ask, as to who is the representative of the United States upon the supreme council.

Mr. FALL. Then, Mr. President, if I have the floor, I should like to know who the members of the supreme council are first, and what difference there is between the peace commission, if there is one, representing this country and what he calls the supreme council, and who constitute the members, if there are any members, of the peace commission of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution does not call for that information.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, while they are seeking information over the telephone, I presume, I should like some other information. I should like to know if there is not a treaty pending which was refused to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate concerning the Dalmatian and Adriatic coasts; and I should like to know, while the Senator is hunting his information, if the treaty which was printed here by order of the Senate a few days ago, which the Senator from Massachusetts succeeded in obtaining from some portion of the earth, apparently, does not deal with this question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator asking me any question?

Mr. FALL. Well, I do not think I will get any information. I am just throwing out this inquiry, so that the Senator, if he can acquire the information, may give it to the Senate later. I am suggesting information upon which I should like to found action in voting finally. I am suggesting a reason for what might be denounced, and has been denounced by the Senator, as delay in the consideration of the treaty pending before us.

I am suggesting, Mr. President, this: I listened a few days since to the Senator from Nebraska expressing his virtuous indignation that the Senator from Massachusetts should ask to have read to this body a treaty with Austria, which is involved in the treaty which we now have under consideration, and concerning which no hearings have been had. I would like to have had some information concerning this very Adriatic coast and the disposition which is to be made in treaties which are being held back from the Senate of the United States, which the President has in his possession, but which he has simply said he did not propose to give us until we were through with this treaty. They are inextricably mixed up with the matter now under discussion, and if we had information of this kind it would not compel us to go to the columns of news press day by day for information with reference to foreign affairs. Then these little interesting controversies would not occupy so much of the time of the Senate and the Senator would not be justified in accusing Senators upon this side of entering into a filibuster for the purpose of deferring consideration of the treaty which is now before us.

If a few intelligent questions—or, possibly, to the mind of the Senator from Nebraska, entirely unintelligent questions—could be answered, if a little light could be thrown upon some of these subjects by some one claiming to know something about them, we would not necessarily be compelled to scan so closely the columns of the daily press and we would not be compelled to ask for information based upon such information as we obtain from the daily press. But the Senator knows perfectly well that he does not know how this great commission he is talking about is functioning, because there are no reports made here as to how it is functioning, or, if there are, they do not get past the White House, and no information is given upon them. The Senator has not that information in his possession.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we are making no objection to the passage of this resolution. What we do object to is the everlasting disposition here to prod and annoy an administration that is doing the best it can to conclude this war and reach a settlement of peace. I know that Senators on the other side of the aisle in general can not sympathize with this disposition. I know that, while they want all legitimate information possible, they are not sympathetic with the disposition to be constantly heckling and attacking the President of the United States in the administration of his duty. Congress, by a magnificent spectacle of patriotism and public spirit, placed in the hands of the President practically unlimited resources and unlimited power to fight this war to a successful conclusion. It gave him great powers—not only the ordinary war powers which a President may have as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but enormous powers, in addition to those, at home.

Is the Senate not content to permit the exercise of those powers in the discretion of the President until a conclusion has been reached? It is true an armistice was signed last November, which went into effect, I believe, the 11th of November; but Senators know that all Europe is in an upheaval still. They all know the dubious condition of things over there. They know the terrible problems of the Dalmatian coast, the great difficulty that nations had in agreeing to the terms of the settlement of the Dalmatian coast. They certainly know that Italy, with every good intention in the matter, is confronted with practically an insurrection among her troops and a threatened revolution. Do they want to have the thing thrown into still worse confusion?

The nations have agreed, practically, on the settlement of the Dalmatian coast problems, and Italy is only restrained by insurrection. It is just as necessary to have naval authority along the Dalmatian coast at the present time in Austrian territory as it is to have military authority along the banks of the Rhine between France and Germany. Those are matters with which the Senate of the United States has nothing to do. We can not direct the Army and Navy where to proceed. It is the President, and the President only, who can do it, as far as the United States is concerned.

Moreover, Mr. President, the United States is not the only one to be considered. The President is compelled to cooperate with the other nations associated with him, and he has done so by the formation of the supreme council. When the supreme council acts, the President of the United States acts. It is his act as much as it is the act of any other nation. We are in no position to call him to account for what he does through the supreme council. The supreme council has jurisdiction over war matters, and war matters only, and war matters and war conditions must prevail as long as men have arms defying the authority of the supreme council, because when they defy the supreme council they defy the United States as well as Italy, because the countries are united in solving the problems of the Dalmatian coast. There is a coast with races intermixed, with difficult problems to solve, the Jugo-Slavs and Italians side by side, living together in a condition in which lawlessness may break out at any time. We ought not to aggravate the situation. We ought to leave the President alone to work out that problem as best he can, in connection with the executive heads of the other nations in the supreme council.

Mr. President, we ought to do something else. We ought to act on this treaty. I say act on it, and I mean act on it, even if it goes against what I believe ought to be done. We ought not to sit here day after day postponing its consideration as long as possible until 2 o'clock. We ought to meet here every morning and take up the peace treaty, and when we reach an amendment we ought to discuss that amendment and not something else.

Yet while the Fall amendments have been before the Senate now for several days there has not been a word of discussion upon the Fall amendments. And to-day, instead of discussing the Fall amendments when the hour of 2 o'clock arrives, I suppose we will have a repetition of what we had yesterday, discussion of something that has nothing to do with the Fall amendments—anything to delay, anything to procrastinate, while a few leaders think they are making a little political capital and getting a political issue.

I warn Senators who are looking for a political issue of that sort that they may find it, but they may afterwards regret doing so. I remember a story of a man who went forth to buy a horse, and he was so anxious to get the horse that he was a little careless in the precautions which he took. He was just as anxious for the horse as these Senators are for a political issue. When he finally found an animal that he thought would suit, he bargained with the man as to the price of the horse, and they agreed upon the price. He took out his money and was about to pay it, but then he said to the man, "Oh, see here; has this horse any faults?" "Well," the man said, "yes; he has two faults." "Well," the purchaser said, "what are they?"

The owner said, "Well now, I will be fair. I will tell you one fault before you pay me the money, and I will tell you the other fault after you pay me the money." The purchaser asked, "What is his first fault?" "Well, the first fault is that I have a good deal of trouble catching this horse when I go out in the morning in the pasture. Sometimes it takes me 15 or 20 minutes to catch the horse." "Oh, well," the purchaser said, "that is all right. Here is your money. Now, what is his second fault?" The seller, as he stuck the money in his pocket, said, "Well, his second fault is that after you catch him he isn't worth a damn." [Laughter.] Senators can draw their own conclusion. After they get the political issue it may then be of not much more value than that horse.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, does the Senator from Nebraska——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. There will be a little order in the Senate. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was going to ask if the Senator from Nebraska was speaking of the league of nations when he described the purchase of the horse.

Mr. FALL. No; that would not come under a horse story; it would be a first cousin of the horse. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The occupants of the galleries have not only been furnished cards by the doorkeepers, but they have been warned. There is going to be quiet in these galleries while I preside here, and whoever does not keep quiet is going to be put out.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I had risen to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, not to make a speech. The Senator from Nebraska stated that the Fiume question had been settled, that Italy had acquiesced in the settlement, and the settlement was only being held up by a revolution, or an insurrection, in the Italian ranks. I presume the Senator had reference to the seizure of Fiume by some Italian soldiers. Now, that is not my understanding of the situation at all. If the Senator from Nebraska has any information with reference to this question, if he has knowledge of the fact that Italy has acquiesced, if there has been a settlement agreed upon with reference to the Fiume proposition or the Dalmatian question generally to which Italy adheres, I wish he would communicate it to the Senate. The Senator has made the statement that it is only being held up by an insurrection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I made that statement. The supreme council acts by unanimity, and that requires the assent of Italy. The supreme council has acted.

Mr. FALL. How? What has it done?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has acted by apportioning the section of the Austrian coast that shall be looked after by the various forces, and America has a duty to perform there.

Mr. FALL. I am not speaking of that, Mr. President. The Senator has said that a settlement has been made of this Dalmatian question, to which Italy has acceded. Now, I want to know what that settlement was.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will find out in due time. That matter is not before the Senate yet, and I do not propose to drag in extraneous matters, nor, as far as I can prevent by my protest, to permit them to be brought here. We have a treaty before the Senate, or that ought to be before the Senate, and there is a deliberate purpose to delay it and hold it up. I do not believe that purpose is indorsed by the majority of Senators on the other side of the aisle, either. I believe they will respond to the desire of this country for action on this treaty. I am willing that it should be defeated, if only we have action. The worst thing is inaction; the worst thing is doubt. Any result is better than that. Why do Senators continue to procrastinate and delay? Why do they not come to a vote—come to a vote to-day on the Fall amendments? Why are they afraid to vote?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I asked a simple question, based upon a flat statement of the Senator from Nebraska, and he can not answer it, of course, because there is no such thing. It is not a fact that he has stated. There has been no final or definite settlement of the Dalmatian or Fiume question, which is being held up by an insurrection. Therefore, of course, the Senator could not answer. But he made the statement.

Our usual source, and our only source of information here, failing to acquire any information from the Senators who are so strongly supporting this treaty, is the public press. We are compelled to go to the press for information. The Associated Press is usually fairly correct in its statements, when it makes any at all. I have here under date of the 27th, a quotation from the speech of Tomasso Tittoni, foreign minister of Italy, speaking in the Chamber of Deputies on that day. The Senator from Nebraska, of course, has access to the same sources of information which are open to the Senator from New Mexico, and he will understand that on yesterday the Chamber of Deputies voted confidence in the ministry. Signor Tittoni says that the situation is growing worse. This article reads:

On the contrary, Signor Tittoni asserted, it had been made more serious and complicated, as the American peace delegation had to communicate with the President by cable, which made delay inevitable.

Not the supreme high council, but the American peace delegation, which is handling and complicating the situation; and they undertook to secure the advice or the consent or the command of the President of the United States by cable, and have not been able to do so. The dispatch continues:

"The question of our relations with President Wilson will have to be cleared up some day," the foreign minister continued. "The inquiry must not be limited to the period commencing with the opening of the peace conference, but must go back to the time of the intervention of the United States in the war, and even farther.

"From the time of President Wilson's manifesto in November, 1916, it was clear he intended to become an arbiter between the combatants. After the intervention of the United States this characteristic of arbiter became accentuated. From December 27, 1917"—

Mark the date—

"our foreign ministry was informed that President Wilson would be considered in Great Britain as the supreme arbiter, be it for continuation of the war or the drafting of peace terms. Some of our diplomatic agents warned the Government it was necessary to secure without delay President Wilson's support for our national claims."

Signor Tittoni said that when the war ended with victory he was convinced Italy would be given recognition of her national aspirations proportionate to her sacrifices. "On the contrary," he added—

This is the official statement of the Italian premier to his Congress, reporting to them the situation and asking their vote of confidence, which he received yesterday—

"On the contrary," he added, "the Italian peace delegates had to engage in a daily struggle to obtain merely partial recognition of Italy's national program. The peace conference had to forego its principal task of drafting peace terms and change itself into an assembly to settle the fate of the whole of Europe, to create new states, to fix new frontiers, and to govern Europe."

Mr. President, this is the opinion of Italy with reference to the trouble now, and there has been no agreement; not yet, sir. The President left France after having driven Orlando out of France, and he left France without settling even the Fiume question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Is not the Senator confounding a final adjustment of these difficulties with some understanding pendente lite whereby the disputed territory may be policed, if I may use that expression? Of course, there has been no adjustment of the Fiume and other controversial claims on the Adriatic, but the Senator knows, because he is one of the best posted men on public affairs in public life—the Senator knows better than I do, perhaps, that French and British troops or garrisons were in Fiume, pursuant either to the order or the understanding of the allied council, prior to its capture by D'Annunzio, and they were there pursuant to this agreement to keep order, so to speak, to prevent the Jugo-Slavs, on the one hand, and the Italians, on the other hand, from rushing at each other's throats. It may prove when we get the information that I am mistaken, but I can not believe that marines were landed on the Dalmatian coast except by that understanding or agreement or order, whatever it may be called, of the allied council, requiring the Americans to look after that part of the coast, and particularly after the very sensational conduct of D'Annunzio, which will probably be accepted by the Italian people, because they can not help themselves. In other words, it seems to me that really the difference between the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Nebraska is in confusing the agreement to which each has referred, the one to the final settlement and the other to some arrangement to keep peace until that final settlement is reached.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Colorado is always level headed, his judgment is excellent, and his suggestions always timely. The mistake, however, under which the Senator is laboring with reference to the position of the Senator from New Mexico is that the Senator from New Mexico is endeavoring to acquire information from some source, and he is only giving as a fact what he understands to have been the situation For example, the Senator remembers the war between Austria and Italy was on the Italian front and by the Italian Army, in which Great Britain and France were represented to a comparatively small number, and that then an armistice was entered into between Italy and Austria by which Austria withdraws beyond certain lines. That included Dalmatia, Fiume, and the coast of the Adriatic now in dispute.

In so far as the Senate is concerned, no further information has been obtainable, at least by myself, except such as we get through the columns of the daily press, with reference to any disputes whatsoever on the Adriatic or Dalmation coast and in Fiume. We hear that the great peace council has been negotiating with reference to it, and now we hear that the supreme war council, acting under war powers, has directed the landing of our marines. That may be true——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if I misunderstood the Senator, it was because he asserted, and nobody can deny it, that there has been no settlement of this difficulty on the coast of the Adriatic. I inferred from that that he was carrying one agreement in his mind differing entirely from that to which the Senator from Nebraska referred.

Mr. FALL. I think I caught clearly the distinction which the Senator from Nebraska drew, at any rate. The peace council, on the one hand, is endeavoring to arrive at a peace settlement and to embrace in the same character of treaty a disposition of Fiume and certain other portions of the Adriatic and Dalmatian coast. In the meantime, the supreme war council is using the naval forces of the United States for the purpose apparently, and that is what we want to know, of keeping peace or driving certain people out of certain districts. Who has allotted to the United States the care over Trau or any other portion of the Dalmatian coast? By whose orders? By the orders of the peace council? No; because they are engaged in——

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I stated that in the statement issued by Secretary Daniels, prior to this discussion on yesterday, he stated that it was the part of the coast that had been assigned for America to patrol. Here is his statement, and I want to read it.

Secretary Daniels's announcement said:
"On September 23 a number of Italians surprised and captured Trau a Dalmatian port in the zone assigned by the supreme council to be policed by the Americans."

Mr. FALL. Just one minute right there. The Senator must understand that the Secretary of the Navy has not answered or referred to the most material question——

Mr. SWANSON. I am not saying that this is an answer. Let me get through reading what the Secretary of the Navy said.

Mr. FALL. The Senator can read it, but it does not touch the question.

Mr. SWANSON. The Secretary's statement continues:

A small landing force from the U. S. S. Olympia succeeded in recovering the town and preserving order there without bloodshed. Serbians were persuaded by Admiral Andrews from taking action.

Then the article continues; but this is not any of the interview with the Secretary:

It was said at the Navy Department that Trau was in that section of the Dalmatian coast assigned by the peace conference to the United States for patrol.

Mr. FALL. We understand that.

Mr. SWANSON (reading):

The Italian Government is responsible for the strip of coast line to the northward and the French for that to the south.

The subject of my comment was this: Here was a statement made that we had been assigned to keep peace there. Of course, this was taken from Austria; it was Austrian territory, and a certain part of that line had been assigned to America to patrol and take care of.

Mr. FALL. To whom was that Austrian territory turned over?

Mr. SWANSON. It is waiting to be turned over. As the Senator well said, it is not finally disposed of.

Mr. FALL. No; and it was not turned over to any league of nations.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Senator's own statement, it is not finally disposed of; and, pending disposition of it finally, Italy had a certain part to patrol, the United States a certain part, and, I understand, France a part. A part was assigned to the United States to patrol, and I understand the Italian Government agreed to this; but other parties, representatives of their own Government, undertook to take possession, and the United States was under obligation to patrol it and preserve it under the peace terms. If that is true, I say the Government ought not to be subject to comment or criticism until we get the facts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. What I was commenting on was that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, before he ascertained what the facts are, should condemn his Government and give the impression that we were engaged in an act of war against Italy. That is what I protest against. I said that the right way to conduct this thing is first to get the facts before you condemn your own Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia just a brief question.

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Washington for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was interested in the statement of the Senator from Virginia that he understood a sector of the Adriatic coast had been turned over to the French. Is the Senator from Virginia well informed in that respect?

Mr. SWANSON. I know nothing except what is contained in the dispatches in the papers yesterday and the day before; and I say, before we should condemn our own Government and put it in the attitude of being complicated in the affairs of Europe, we should wait until we get the facts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We are trying to get the facts now; and I ask the Senator from Virginia whether it is a fact that any of the allied soldiers, except the Americans and Italians, are taking part in the military occupations on the Dalmatian coast?

Mr. SWANSON. The only information I have is what is contained in the press dispatches, that this port was seized by the Italians.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I noticed a short time ago the statement that French soldiers and British soldiers—troops, marines, or others—had been reembarked on their respective ships and had sailed away from the Dalmatian coast.

Mr. SWANSON. The situation, as I understand it from the press dispatches, is that this part of the coast was turned over to the United States to patrol and take care of, pending settlement of its disposition by the peace conference, and pending that determination the Italians rushed in there without authority and seized it. As the United States accepted the obligation of keeping it free from Italy and free from Serbia, our marines were landed to carry out the obligations which the United States assumed, either by the war council or the peace conference, I do not know whom. That is the impression I have from the press dispatches, which I presume are the same that the Senator from Massachusetts and others saw. All I ask is that you get accurate information before you condemn your Government for becoming involved in these complicated foreign affairs.

Mr. FALL. That is what we have been seeking for several months—accurate information.

One of the Senators upon the other side urges that we should vote upon the resolution. We have voted upon resolutions, we have passed resolutions, we have demanded, we have begged, we have prayed, through the Committee on Foreign Relations and otherwise, for information, and the action of the Senate so far upon these propositions has been practically futile.

As a matter of fact, as I understand the situation, the Dalmatian coast and the coast in dispute was turned over by Austria to the victorious Italian Army in their armistice. What Signor Tittoni is objecting to is that the peace council then undertook to write the geography of the world anew, to create new States, instead of going to a peace basis first; that they have not as yet been able to agree upon the question as to whom certain portions of the Dalmatian coast, or the other portions of the Adriatic coast, should go, and in the meantime the supreme war council, created, if for any purpose, to carry on the war with Austria and Hungary, created, if legally at all, through the war powers inherent in the President of the United States merely as the Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces, created presumably by himself as one of the actors, has undertaken, pending the settlement by the peace council, to patrol certain coasts. They are not patrolling them on foot; these marines were not walking the Adriatic Sea. The naval vessels of Great Britain and France and the United States are carrying on a patrol of the Adriatic. For some reason American marines were landed from a naval vessel at the point which is known as Trau, because, apparently, so far as the honorable and learned Secretary of the Navy knows, the Italians were undertaking to drive Serbians out of Trau.

Now, I want to know by what authority the marines of the United States are undertaking to interfere between Serbians and Italians in Trau; and it is answered here that peace does not yet exist and that, therefore, as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States, the President of the United States can send the troops and the marines of this country to interfere, without the authority of Congress, in trouble between the Serbians and the Italians, both of whom were allies of this country in the war.

Mr. President, when we were considering the great war powers which Congress vested in the President of the United States I voted for every possible war measure, because I desired that the war should be conducted under legal forms and under the Constitution of the United States as nearly as possible. Therefore I voted to vest in the President of the United States the very maximum of power, so that he might successfully carry on the war in this country as well as in foreign countries; but I stated here upon the floor at that time—and I reiterate it now—that the fact that the United States was at war, and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, the President automatically became Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces, did not make him a dictator. I know that several Senators upon the other side here in open debate advance the contrary theory. The President of the United States is not a military dictator, and the act of unwarranted interference in foreign countries by the military force of the United States without the authority of Congress is the act of a dictator.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only desire to say a single word as to the reiterated statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that there is a filibuster being conducted here. That is an entire mistake; it is completely erroneous. There is no filibuster, and there has been no desire for one. Our desire is to get this treaty through—certainly that is my desire—and to dispose of it just as soon as possible; but, Mr. President, what is overlooked on the other side is that this is rather an important question. A great many Senators on both sides are not voting according to orders, and they wish to discuss this treaty. That is their right. It is the greatest question that ever came before the United States Senate or that probably ever will come before it. There has not been a word spoken here that has not been genuine debate, and debate has come from Senators who feel deeply on this question and who wish to discuss it. I have kept the treaty steadily before the Senate, and I shall continue to do so, so far as I have anything to say about it. There has never been a filibuster, and so far as I am concerned there never will be one; but I do not propose to go on and try—what would be perfectly useless and what would produce a filibuster—to cut Senators off from the legitimate debate to which they are entitled.

Now, Mr. President, one word about the pending resolution. I have not before me a copy of the armistice between Italy and Austria, but, as I recall it, the Dalmatian coast was a part of the territory taken over by Italy in the armistice. We are told that it has been in some way slipped out of the possession of Italy and slipped into the hands of the peace council. I do not know how it has been done, although I have asked for the agreement in order to ascertain the facts. All I know is that our marines have been landed with machine guns to put the Italians out of the town of Trau and to leave the Serbians in control there. Now, I should like to know under what authority, of the treaty or otherwise, that has been done. These nations are both friendly to us; they have both been our allies in the war. Who ordered this to be done? What commitments have been made? Why have two regiments been sent to Silesia to supervise the plebiscite? Is that another of our commitments?

I submitted a resolution on Friday last making inquiry with regard to the U. S. S. Henderson carrying troops to Schleswig-Holstein. The resolution was adopted; but, of course, I have no answer from the department. I find, however, from my own personal inquiry, that the ship sailed on September 12, and that her purpose is to take some of the marines who are already over there and carry them to Denmark to supervise the plebiscite in Schleswig-Holstein. To how many of these activities are we committed, and by whom? Those are the inquiries I should like to see answered. I think it is legitimate and proper that we should have this information, and it would shorten the time to be consumed in debate and advance the treaty if those proper inquiries were allowed to be asked and were then answered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, regardless of who ordered the American marines to Trau, regardless of what the situation of the Allies at the peace conference is at the present time, there are certain generally understood cardinal facts about which I think there is no dispute, and which ought not to be overlooked in the consideration of this question nor in any public record that is made of it. A short time ago the President, on his return from Europe, said, with rather a tone of pride in the fact, that wherever there was any difficult work to be done in Europe which required soldiers to do it the immediate demand of all the Allies was that American soldiers should perform the duty. I presume that the presence of American marines at the danger point in this controversy, which, it is said, is about to precipitate war, and, as the Senator from Nebraska says, may set Europe on fire, comes about as a result of that peculiar sort of a willingness upon the part of the President to accept commitments of this kind and to have disagreeable duties throughout Europe that European nations are unwilling to assume performed by American soldiers.

The fact is, however it came about, whatever the preliminaries were, that, as shown by the statement of Minister Tittoni, which has been read here this morning by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and as shown by the fact that our military forces are actually participating in the controversy, the United States is the principal factor in the determination and the direction of the issue which has brought Italy to the verge of civil war. That fact ought not to be overlooked. Who precipitated this condition? Why is Italy on the verge of civil war? Why is there danger of a new war between the Jugo-Slav State and Italy? Who is responsible for that? That ought not to be overlooked. In my opinion, it is the cardinal, central, significant circumstance in this entire matter that ought to be constantly borne in mind.

This condition of incipient war, of nations being ready to spring at each other's throats, and a great nation, our ally in the German war, being torn by civil strife, with scenes of disorder in its Parliament and its people divided over the question as to the settlement of Fiume, has been brought about, in my judgment—and I think that this is a fact that can be demonstrated if it is disputed—by the attitude that was taken by the American delegation in the peace conference. It has been deliberately produced by our representatives in that conference.

Mr. MOSES rose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Italy, France, and Great Britain, if left to themselves in the settlement of this peculiar European question, I think, without doubt, would long ago have adjusted it. They would have adjusted it perhaps in accordance with the aspirations of their allies in the war and not in accordance with the demands or the desires or the fancied interests of our enemies in the war. It was the American delegation at the peace conference that prevented the settlement of the Dalmatian boundary dispute, and as a result of that, as a result of the opinions of the American delegation and of the injection of this country, the most remote from the scene of the controversy of all the Allies, into the dispute as an arbiter, as Signor Tittoni designates it, the American delegation is responsible for the present condition. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, my purpose merely was to invoke the charity of the Senator from Washington. He charges that the American peace delegation in Paris "deliberately" brought about this condition of affairs by their malassociation with the Dalmatian question. I invoke his charity and ask him that he withdraw the adverb "deliberately" and use in place the adverb "ignorantly." I beseech the Senator from Washington to have a heart.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, it was done willfully as a part of a deliberately chosen policy by our delegation at Paris, wholly without sanction by our people, to set itself up as the judge and the arbiter of a question which should have been left to Europe to settle; and to ascertain that phase of the matter is really the ultimate purport of the pending resolution, and, I suppose, the motive which prompted its introduction, and indicates the use which the Senate will be called upon to make of the information which comes from it. It involves one of the central principles which the league of nations and the peace treaty are to dispose of. It is a proper subject of inquiry, of debate, and of disposition in the consideration of the peace treaty and of the league of nations.

This participation by American military forces in a purely local controversy on the Adriatic does not involve in any way whatever, as the Senator from Nebraska has undertaken to intimate here, the issues between the Allies and Germany over which this war was fought. It is an entirely new question and an incidental one. It deals with the future and not with the past. It is a question which Italy and France and England are immeasurably better informed about and better fitted to deal with than the United States is; and it is for the Senate to determine, in the disposition of this peace treaty, whether we shall continue the policy of settling with our diplomatic and military forces European disputes of this nature. If the United States has need for military force, it might turn its attention to the condition in Mexico, a bordering nation in which we have a peculiar interest, and peculiar and traditional obligations to perform—obligations which we have already assumed—and settle those, and devote the attention of the Government and the resources of the Nation to performing duties which already rest upon us, instead of searching over the face of the world to find and assume gratuitously obligations which properly rest upon other nations.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, has the pending resolution been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. There was no objection to it an hour and a quarter ago, but nothing has been done yet.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is in order, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 190, being House bill 7478.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection to this resolution——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the House bill is to be taken up, I think there ought to be at least a quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us get this resolution out of the way. There was no objection to it an hour and a quarter ago. If there is no objection, the resolution is agreed to.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I renew my motion.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, with amendments.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be considered first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Is there any objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this is a very short bill, and I believe it ought to be read. At all events, the bill should be read.

Mr. McLEAN. It will be read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from North Dakota objects to the bill being read and the committee amendments being considered as we go along with the reading, does he?

Mr. GRONNA. I think I shall insist on the bill being read in full. I think we can dispose of it more quickly by having it read in full.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that it was to be read in full, but that as we reached the committee amendments we would dispose of them as we went along. Does the Senator object to that course?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I have no objection to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought not.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 16, before the words "per cent," to strike out the numerals "110" and insert the numerals "115," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, be further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association, actually paid in and unimpaired, and 10 per cent of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment, and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act, (2) the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same, (3) the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligation is not at any time less than 115 per cent of the face amount of the notes secured by such documents and when such property is fully covered by insurance, and (4) the discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds or notes of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments were, on page 2, line 24, after the word "any," to strike out the word "company"; on line 25, after the word "firm," to insert "or company, or the several members thereof"; on page 3, line 9, before the word "corporation," to strike out the word "company" and the comma; and in the same line, after the words "or firm," to insert the words "or company, or the several members thereof"; on line 12, after the word "hereof," to insert the words "except transactions under (1), (2), and (4)"; in line 16, after the words "one person," to strike out the word "company"; and in line 17, to insert the words "or company, or the several members thereof," so as to read:

The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any corporation, or firm, or company, or the several members thereof upon any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association and secured by bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness as described in (4) hereof shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association and the total liabilities to any association of any person or of any corporation, or firm, or company, or the several members thereof for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, except transactions under (1), (2), and (4), shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the notes of any one person, corporation, or firm, or company, or the several members thereof for more than six months in any consecutive 12 months.

The amendments were agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 20, Title I, of the act approved April 5, 1918, be further amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5202. No national banking association shall at any time be indebted, or in any way liable, to an amount exceeding the amount of its capital stock at such time actually paid in and remaining undiminished by losses or otherwise, except on account of demands of the nature following:

"First. Notes of circulation.

"Second. Moneys deposited with or collected by the association.

"Third. Bills of exchange or drafts drawn against money actually on deposit to the credit of the association, or due thereto.

"Fourth. Liabilities to the stockholders of the association for dividends and reserve profits.

"Fifth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the Federal reserve act.

"Sixth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of the War Finance Corporation act.

"Seventh. Liabilities created by the indorsement of accepted bills of exchange payable abroad actually owned by the indorsing bank and discounted at home or abroad."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have two amendments that I desire to offer to the bill. One relates to page 3, line 13. I move to strike out the numerals "25" and to insert in lieu thereof the numerals "20." I will state the other amendment I propose, because I intend to argue the two together. The other amendment which I intend to propose is to insert on page 2, line 23, after the word "section" and the period, a new sentence, as follows:

The total liabilities to any association of any person, or corporation, or firm, or company, or the several members thereof, upon the discount of bills of exchange, drafts, demand obligations, and commercial or business paper, as described in paragraphs 1 and 2 hereof, shall not exceed at any time the paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus of said association.

Mr. President, those are separate amendments and, I take it, will have to be offered separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 3, line 13, to strike out "25" before the words "per centum," and in lieu thereof to insert "20," so as to read: "and (4) shall not at any time exceed 20 per centum of the amount," and so forth.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize very fully the anxiety which is evident on the part of certain Senators to have this bill go through amending the Federal reserve act in the particulars indicated by the bill which has just been read and to which have been added the committee amendments.

The other day I took the pains to set out specifically the objections. Since that time there has been a meeting of the committee, and Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, appeared before the committee with his statement respecting the bill. I say, with all due respect to Gov. Harding and those members of the committee who differ with me, that the evidence given before the committee simply confirms me in my former judgment that the amendents which I am now proposing ought to be adopted.

The Senate, of course, is familiar with the limitations which are placed upon the amount of loans which can be secured by a given borrower under the provisions of the old national banking act and of the Federal reserve act. This general limitation is 10 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus. That originally was the only limitation, as I now recall, which was placed upon the amount that an individual borrower could get, and I take it the Congress of the United States has at heart the interests of the depositors and stockholders, as well as of the borrowers.

Now, I want to qualify a statement I made a moment ago. Under the national banking act it was provided that the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values would not be considered as money borrowed within the contemplation of the act. A canvass of this bill demonstrates that there are now four classes of borrowings which qualify largely the first provision to the effect that the amount that can be borrowed shall be 10 per cent of the capital and surplus.

Passing over paragraphs 1 and 2 for the moment, there has been added a third paragraph, which, in substance, provides for the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title, covering readily marketable, nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligation is not at any time less than 115 per cent of the face amount of the notes secured by such documents and when such property is fully covered by insurance. That is entirely new.

Now, it is sought to extend the amount which may be borrowed, over and above the 10 per cent which applies to borrowers generally, to 25 per cent, as is provided for on page 3 of the pending bill, which reads, without reading the whole of it, that "the total amount of liabilities upon notes such as described in paragraph 3 shall not, except transactions under 1, 2, and 4, at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus." That means to say that with this collateral in the form of shipping documents on the notes of the borrower, he can secure 25 per cent of the paid-in capital stock and surplus. In paragraph 4, which relates to borrowings upon Government bonds and certificates of indebtedness, Congress provided that there could be an additional 10 per cent borrowed by one borrower over and above the general limitation of the paid-in capital stock and surplus, and then it authorized the Federal Reserve Board to extend this amount, and some time ago the Federal Reserve Board extended these limitations, so that the only limit placed upon the amount which can be borrowed with bonds as security is $100 on every $105 of the face value of the bonds.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, at which it is usual to take up the consideration of the treaty, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session for the purpose of taking up the treaty with Germany.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish simply to say that in view of the desire to go on with the treaty, I shall not at this time proceed with the argument on the matter under consideration, but will continue it upon this point at a later time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency before making the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session, and he agreed that the bill should go over.

Mr. POMERENE. I take no exception to the course taken by the Senator from Connecticut.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a few observations on the subject now before the Senate and I promise that I will confine those observations within the brief space of 20 minutes, not that I can cover the important details of the league of nations in 20 minutes, but I think in that time I can make my viewpoint entirely clear.

Mr. President, in the nation-wide discussion of the peace treaty and the covenant of the proposed league of nations I feel that it may be only fair to my constituents, and perhaps to the country and to the Senate and to the President, at this time to clearly define my attitude and my viewpoint.

Above all, the country wants action. To use the vernacular, it wants to know "where it is at." For nearly a year the treaty has occupied the center of the stage exclusive of every other responsibility both at home and abroad. I do not minimize the importance of its careful consideration, but I do urge all possible haste. Business hesitates in the apprehension of uncertainty; the minds of our officials and legislators, which should be turned to constructive legislation, are necessarily engrossed with the treaty and its probable effects; the country is kept in a state of political turmoil and confusion; the people are anxious to know the policies of the Government on many pressing subjects—railroad legislation, for instance; readjustment of unjust and onerous taxation; curtailment of extravagance and wicked waste in Government expenditures; adoption of a national budget system; legislative encouragement of production which must operate to reduce the high cost of living; cultivation of sincerely friendly relations between employer and employee; adequate utilization of the merchant marine; expansion of a good-roads system; rehabilitation of our gallant soldiers, to help them to help themselves; and a score of other imperative questions. Meanwhile, industrial unrest is epidemic in the land; and the Bolshevists and internationalists still use internecine strife. It is not that I am particularly impressed with the statement that the settlement of peace will settle domestic problems; I do not believe anything of the sort, but the disposition of this covenant will permit this Congress to utilize all its energy and power in the effort to solve domestic problems, encourage increased production, and thus assure national prosperity.

Although a signer of the "round robin," I am in favor of a league of nations; although in favor of a league of nations, I am not in favor of adopting a covenant which does not in plain, specific, unmistakable terms protect to the utmost the freedom and independence of the United States to regulate its own domestic affairs and to say for itself whether or not it should participate in any foreign war. I am in favor of a league of nations, but not at the sacrifice of the sovereignty we are sworn to uphold, and I further contend that in protecting that sovereignty we can contribute fully as much to the world and the welfare of all mankind as we did under the same policy in the time of war. I am in favor of a league of nations, but not the league that the President has brought home to us with its uncertain and undefined commitments, but a league as it will be with protective reservations adopted.

As I view it, America is willing and should be a world partner in the affairs of the world and contribute its ideals to the uplifting of mankind, but it is not willing to underwrite all the selfish ambitions of European politics. We will back up our moral ideals with our men and money when the principles of democracy are involved, but we insist on being the arbiters of our own Americanism without any question of our honor or destiny being at stake. In other words, while it may sound selfish, the extent that I feel America should participate in a league of nations is to sincerely and earnestly contribute its moral influence, its power, and even its wealth in cooperation with the other nations of the world in an endeavor to preserve peace, but we must absolutely control, without question of honor, the extent to which we will be involved in foreign entanglements which may embroil us in an unjust war.

I do not propose to discuss the subject from the legal or historical viewpoint, but, as briefly as may be possible, from the practical, economic, and business standpoint. In putting it thus bluntly, I do not want to be misunderstood as considering the responsibility from its mere material relation to the country, but so much already has been said on the lines of history, political expediency, moral obligation, future responsibility, and so on, that I feel a few words may not be amiss in dealing with the subject from the angle of its practical present effect on the United States and the prosperity of the United States. Nor would I care to be misunderstood as ignoring the higher phases—the sacrifices of even their lives by our brave soldiers on the field, the sacrifices of those who loved them, and those who went willingly to make the supreme sacrifice it required; the sacrifices of our people who were not called actively into the Great War, and the sacrifices of our Nation. I shall speak as a man of business, but not as a cold-blooded man of business.

I believe that his fellow Senators, the people of his State, and the people of the Nation are entitled to know at this critical moment the exact attitude and sentiments of each individual Senator in regard to the treaty and the covenant if one's mind has been made up. Now, I shall practice what I preach.

As America evaded no responsibility in time of war, neither can she in time of peace. I am convinced that the United States may contribute to the world's tranquillity by entering a league of nations, not alone for the welfare of the world, but likewise for its own advantage. I am insistent that in entering such a league the sovereignty and independence and national and international rights of the United States shall be preserved to the uttermost. I want such sovereignty and independence and rights distinctly and specifically preserved by clear and unmistakable language in any instrument of international copartnership we may sign. Why is it not entirely proper that we should stipulate the conditions upon which, to a great extent, even with reservations, we alter our time-honored policy of aloofness? I have not the slightest objection to other nations doing likewise if they so elect, and if it does not interfere with our affairs. Any league of nations at the outcome must be somewhat elastic as is the case with any material experiment, to which class this effort surely belongs. I do not propose, if I can help to prevent it, that the United States shall have the voice of a mere minority stockholder in a corporation in which it is to make such a tremendous investment. I do not believe that our boys should be sent into war to preserve the boundary lines of any old or newly created foreign nation simply as a policing proposition. In short, I would not sacrifice one iota of the national freedom of the United States in every conceivable line. I can and will, conscientiously and enthusiastically, vote for any and every reservation designed to protect positively, specifically, and unmistakably the sovereignty of the United States against domination or dictation by the council or assembly of the proposed league of nations, or by any other nation or group of nations, and am entirely willing to concede our neighbors the same privilege. If they do not want us on these terms, their sincerity is certainly open to question.

On the other hand, as I understand the situation, reservations as a part of the resolution of ratification will protect the sovereignty of the United States very probably without rereference of the treaty and covenant to the joint peace conference, and for that reason I prefer reservations to textual amendments, which latter apparently would necessitate renewed and possibly prolonged discussion by the conference. I am in entire sympathy with the objects sought by the various amendments already offered, but I prefer the reservation route as the method of accomplishment.

No one can deny the desirability of speed in order that the evolution of world affairs can be settled and reconstruction and domestic problems which are so pressing be undertaken, and I am convinced textual amendments will mean more delay and offer no greater protection to America's independence and self-control. Therefore I am for reservations. I always have felt, even before becoming a Member of this honorable body, that, while the Constitution charges the Senate with the task and duty of advising and consenting to all treaties, it hardly was intended that the Senate should rewrite a treaty, but that we, as representing the United States, should be principally concerned with positively and emphatically protecting the independence and rights and sovereignty of our own country. It appears to me that we are not in a position to rewrite the present treaty, even in part; we are not in possession of sufficient facts or knowledge of international negotiations; we have only superficial and surface information. Certain features of the treaty appeal to us as offering opportunity, if not demand, for improvement; that is self-evident. I do not doubt for an instant that many sections of the treaty could be greatly improved if we had the necessary information at hand, and perhaps even though we have not. But I repeat that I feel our main responsibility is to protect the destiny of our own country; and if by making reservations we are satisfied that we are protecting America's sovereignty and independence, then I am not greatly concerned as a Senator of the United States with the other details of the treaty, and am content to permit the further responsibility to rest where it belongs and where history will place it. In other words, I believe it would be impossible for this Senate to get very far with the rewriting or even amending of the instrument. For illustration, I agree with much that has been said from the information at hand as to the action in awarding Shantung to Japan, and especially in the way it was done, but yet, on the other hand, if we attempt to change that award and thus decide in Washington an issue between China and Japan, we are doing the very thing that, it seems to me, we should avoid—that is, entering into foreign entanglements and deciding an issue with only a portion of the evidence or facts before us. Therefore in this, as in practically every matter which has been brought to the attentiton of the Senate through suggested amendment, I feel that we are better serving our country, which is our first and prime responsibility, by making such positive reservations as will assure that our country will not be involved in future controversies, wars, or other entanglements, except as agreed by the people of the United States through action of the United States Congress.

As I have already stated, I am not opposed to the formation of a league of nations, in order that our moral influence in the affairs of the world may be felt, but the United States should have an anchor to windward, so that if conditions are not satisfactory some time in the future we can withdraw without any question being raised of our honor in so doing. In thus acting we evade no responsibility, but refuse to enter into what seems to contemplate a superstate.

The President asserts that no shadow of sovereignty or independence of the United States is even threatened by the present instrument; other persons, equally competent to judge, differ with him. He may be right, or may think he is right; but it is our duty to put into clear, plain, and unmistakable language provisions which are susceptible of different interpretations, as these most emphatically are susceptible, as shown in the bitter discussions of their meanings. I have read in the newspapers intimations that even if we make only reservations the treaty will be withdrawn from the consideration of the Senate; that is not a contingency for the Senate to consider, nor will it be responsible, under the sworn responsibility imposed on it by the Constitution, for any further delay which would arise if such action were taken. We have enough to occupy our minds in striving to protect the United States without worrying about extraneous possibilities.

I share fully the feeling that sentiment and ideals should exert great influence in national and international government relationships, but the extreme of idealism and sentiment is sometimes as impractical and unworkable as the failure to permit inspiration along these lines is harmful. Moreover, do not let us have all the sentiment or idealism on one side of the Atlantic. Ever since the armistice was signed, and even before, I have been confident that promotion of interest between nations in order, if possible, to avert future wars was absolutely the duty of those interested in the making of peace. I never have shared the view frequently expressed that at the successful conclusion of the war the United States could entirely withdraw within its own border and continue as before a practically uninterrupted domestic development without having reciprocal relationship with the other countries of the world. Our economic interests would not permit such action even if we so desired.

Viewing the problem from a selfish angle, we agree that the United States to-day must broaden its activity from an economic and commercial standpoint, and it is necessary from that standpoint that we offer this cooperation in times of peace as we successfully offered it in times of war. How can we, with a merchant marine of which we all speak with pride, isolate America? How can we isolate America and yet expect to carry our products to every corner of the civilized world? How can we isolate America with 2,000,000 American boys returning to its shores with a new world point of view, with broadened ideas, with an interest and knowledge and an ambition helped by foreign contact? How can we isolate America when we consider the modern developments by sea and air and communication with Europe reduced by seaplane and airplane to almost a distance less than that from the Atlantic to the Pacific? I never have felt that America should isolate herself or say to her allies and her foreign friends that we have contributed to help bring about peace, but that now we return alone to our own domestic affairs. It is not fair to our own people or to the world. It is not fair to the era in which we live. Again may I repeat, America evaded no responsibility during the war; America will evade no responsibility in reconstructing, in place of the old order of things, a firm structure which will help maintain the peace achieved at such a sacrifice.

I will go far in the establishment of a league of nations, but I shall ever bear in mind the President's own admonition, uttered in an address to Congress before "visions" and world leadership and "voices in the air" apparently beclouded every other consideration:

> There is one choice we can not make; we are incapable of making. We will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated.

I am prepared to accept the covenant controlling the activities and powers of a society of the nations of the world, providing such covenant, in language that can not be questioned, protects the sovereignty and the domestic power and control of our own country and simply in effect pledges us to assist other nations in any manner not contrary to the provisions of our Constitution. No combination of nations can ask the Senate of the United States to leave a doubt as to whether the Constitution is being circumvented or otherwise. It has been said by proponents of the league covenant as written that those questions so much discussed—control of immigration, the tariff, maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, power to declare war, and so forth—are in no way disturbed by the provisions of the covenant as presented to us. If this be true, there can be no valid objection in the least to making this plain. The Senate of the United States, representing 110,000,000 people, should say so in clear, unmistakable language. That is what I stand for. Months ago, even before I had the honor of becoming a Member of this body, in a speech made in New Jersey, I made practically these same assertions. I have not changed my mind since. On the contrary, I am even more firmly convinced that it is the duty of this body to make it clear and unmistakable. Moreover, through not having participated in the peace conference, the Senate probably is in a better position to perfect the covenant than was President Wilson, who, to some extent, was naturally obliged to give and take.

This plan for a league of nations is not a new idea. Through scores on scores of years the plan has been discussed at intervals. Go back over a century in the British state papers and you will find an utterance of great interest on the subject. Even while Mr. Wilson still was a professor at Princeton, before he became president of that great university, President McKinley, in 1901, said:

> No nation can longer be indifferent to any other. The period of aloofness is past.

And his great successor, President Theodore Roosevelt, nine years later voiced this view to the Nobel peace prize committee:

> It would be a master stroke if those great powers bent on peace would form a league of peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves, but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others.

Read the platform of the New York Republican State Convention of July, 1918, more than a year ago; you will find in it these words:

> We favor the immediate creation by the United States and its allies of a league of nations to establish, from time to time to modify, and to enforce the rules of international law and conduct.

But the purpose of such a league this platform distinctly specified "should be, not to displace patriotism or devotion and loyalty to national ideals and traditions, but rather to give to these new opportunities of expression in cooperation with the other liberty-loving nations of the world." The present proposition is merely a development and expansion of the original idea, proportionate to the development and expansion of the civilization of the world. The sons of Noah have peopled the earth, and it may be that the time has come to reunite, in a measure, the scattered descendants in a family circle.

Such, Mr. President, are some of the considerations which have convinced my mind and conscience that the United States should, or at least reasonably may, enter a league of nations. But my mind and my conscience both robustly oppose the sacrifice of American independence or of a single safeguard of American tradition and ideals; my mind and conscience adamantly refuse to reliquish one iota of the right of the United States to regulate its own domestic affairs—my mind says such surrenders would prove weakness of my powers of reason; my conscience warns me they would be a moral wrong if not actually a moral crime. So, when we are told by some of the league's proponents that article 10 does not force the United States into war without the consent of Congress, I ask what objection there possibly can be to having this provision made so clear and precise that he who runs may read and that no national or international tribunal shall be required to interpret it in the future or that through its construction our beloved country might be placed in the position of failing to meet its obligations.

As I have said, Mr. President, this covenant, in a way, forms an international copartnership, written in the blood of millions of men. How careful should we be who are asked to invest not only our material resources but also the very lives of our citizens and our national independence and honor! We must remember that as long as this covenant or any other agreement of copartnership is open to argument and multiple interpretations it is unsafe and should not be accepted until everything is made clear beyond dispute, as far as this be possible.

For what we went into the war we all know full well, and the soldiers who fought so bravely knew then and know now. We went into the war for, first, the honor, and second, the safety and preservation of the United States. Are we now to surrender those rights and that honor? Or shall we preserve them intact and unsullied by reasonable reservations to the covenant? For what we did not go into the war we also know full well, and the soldiers who bravely fought our battles know equally well. We did not go into the war to surrender our independence and our rights, and we would be serving no one if we did. Of the thousands of brave Americans who laid down their lives on the field of battle or in the camp or in the hospital not one would have given his little finger in sacrifice if he had thought it meant the loss of our independence or our rights. It was for the honor and independence and rights and safety of the United States that these men fought and that we at home gave gladly of our substance. If we now surrender these to the keeping of foreign nations, our brave boys have, indeed, "died in vain."

"The stage is set, the destiny disclosed," says Mr. Wilson. But, my fellow Senators, I urge you, let us look well to the future, to the protection of our children and our children's children in the independence we have enjoyed, and rather ponder the words of Machiavelli, "For time, driving all things before it, may bring with it evil as well as good."

Mr. FALL obtained the floor.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, before discussing the specific provisions of the treaty and the proposed amendments thereto which constitute the pending business before the Senate, I desire to refer shortly to some of the arguments which have been made in this Chamber within the last two or three days as to the constitution of the council and assembly of the league, and as to the results to the United States under certain circumstances, should a matter in which the United States may be interested be referred to the council for consideration and determination. The argument which I shall attempt to present will be for the purpose of clearing a way for a proper consideration and understanding of the distinct propositions which are pending, and which I shall urge upon the Senate.

Several Senators upon the other side a few days since engaged in a discussion of the organization of the council of the league of nations, and also in a discussion of the results which might inure to this country in the event that a matter it was interested in, or had in controversy, if it were with some other nation, were referred to arbitration or to the council, and the decision were to be against the construction placed upon the matter by this country, and the decision should be one with which this country could not agree.

During the discussion, to which I listened with great interest, I thought of a case pending. The United States is now being asked to become a member of the league of nations and a member of the council of the league. One of the countries, and one upon this hemisphere, which has not yet been mentioned in connection with the league or this peace treaty at the peace table in Versailles, in Paris, or elsewhere, is the Republic of Mexico, to the south. Very few people would recall until the matter is mentioned the fact that there has been a controversy pending for many years between the United States upon the one hand and Mexico upon the other concerning a certain disputed piece of territory lying within the boundaries of the State of Texas and within the city limits of one of the most progressive cities within that great State. This disputed strip is known as the Chamizal zone.

Under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and later under the Gadsden purchase treaty of 1854, we had supposed that we had settled all disputes with our neighbor upon the south which then or thereafter might arise, except such as might be caused by a shifting of the boundary where the Rio Grande formed the boundary line between the two countries. Following these treaties the Congress of the United States provided for the appointment of a boundary commission, the Mexican Government followed the same course, and what was known and is yet known as the Joint Boundary Commission was established, and proceeded to function immediately, and was very active for a great many years, and, in fact, up to 9 or 10 years ago, when the revolution, which is still unsettled, in Mexico broke out. Through the efforts of this boundary commission all disputes of any kind or character due to the shifting of the bed of the Rio Grande were amicably settled. But a few years since some enterprising Yankee went into the State of Texas and the city of El Paso and bought up titles to certain lands lying within the city limits, extending from the city hall and the courthouse in El Paso to the Rio Grande, obtaining a quit-claim deed or other muniments of title for such lands. Suit was initiated in the State courts, and promptly decided against this claimant, who maintained his rights under Mexican titles. The United States had been in political possession of this territory from about the year 1854 down to the present time. The Mexican Government had made no claim whatsoever to any portion of the territory. There was no dispute, in so far as the two Nations were concerned, until the dispute was brought to the attention of this Government through the efforts of the rival real estate claimants, after they or those claiming under the Mexican titles had failed to obtain what they considered their proper redress in the courts; the courts, of course, holding that the settlement of boundaries was a political matter and that the courts would not interfere with the political department.

As I say, there was no dispute between the two countries until the question of rival ownership arose. The parties had been in possession of the lands for a great many years. It had been recognized as a part of the county of El Paso and the State of Texas. The customhouses of the United States are placed upon it. The flag of the United States floats over it night and day. The American ends of the international bridges, of which there were at the time three, rest upon this disputed territory.

That matter is still unadjusted. Now, let us see just what would be the result if the league of nations attempted to function, and what would be the course to be followed under the different provisions of the league covenant in settlement of this question.

Mexico is not a member of the league and has not been invited to become a member of the league. We will grant, for the sake of argument, now, that the United States is a member and that the league has been formed by the adhesion to the covenant of three of the great powers mentioned, and a procès verbal being filed. Very well. Upon the suggestion of some mutual friend or otherwise, or without the interposition of a mutual friend, but through a suggestion to the assembly or to the council that there is a dispute between the United States and Mexico concerning this territory which might lead to trouble or might affect the peace of the world—and such a suggestion is all that is necessary to confer jurisdiction upon either the assembly or the council—upon such suggestion, or upon the motion of some friend of Mexico, the council immediately takes cognizance of the question for the purpose of inviting Mexico to become temporarily a member of the league for the settlement of the dispute. Mexico, of course, acquiesces in this immediately, and for the purposes of this particular dispute she becomes a member of the league under article 17 of the league provisions.

At once the suggestion is made by Mexico or by her friend, or otherwise, that the question, not of damages for any injury done by the taking over of this territory 50 years ago by the United States, but the actual right to the physical possession of property which has been undisputed until recent years, and then disputed only as I have indicated—the actual physical possession of territory, not only territory of the United States but territory of one of the sovereign States of this Union, the great State of Texas—is involved.

The United States refuses to arbitrate. At once, by virtue of the provisions of the different articles of the covenant, and article 12 in particular, the council automatically takes jurisdiction of the question. The United States having refused to arbitrate this matter and seeking to protect all her rights upon this hemisphere, Mexico being in the league now for the purposes of the settlement of this dispute, America raises the question of the Monroe doctrine, and construes it to mean that other nations, including the league of nations—those represented in the league or out of it—shall not interfere in matters upon this hemisphere. Mexico at once answers that, as to the Monroe doctrine, it is not a regional understanding. We have denied it. It requires more than one party to make an understanding about anything. We have denied that the Monore doctrine is a regional understanding. The council proceeds to discuss the question as to whether it is a regional understanding, or whether, being a regional understanding, it applies to a question simply of disputed territory between two countries on this hemisphere, and very promptly decides that in any event, whether the Monroe doctrine is in full force and effect or not, it does not apply to the question at issue.

Very well. The decision of the council is unanimous, the United States not voting, nor Mexico voting, and they decide that Mexico is entitled to the Chamizal zone. Now, the United States is and has been in undisputed possession of it—unquestioned possession except as the question arose in the trial of these cases, and then came up to our State Department. The United States has had physical possession. The State of Texas has had her rangers and her police force upon the territory without any question or dispute. The American flag is to-day flying, as it has flown for 50 years, over it. American sovereignty upon it is unquestioned. The decision of the council is against the United States.

What are we to do—acquiesce in the surrender of a portion of the territory of a sovereign State of the Union without the consent of that State or refuse to acquiesce and offer to pay damages, but insist upon retaining our possession? If I know the American people, they will at least adopt the latter course; and if I know the people of the State of Texas, the United States will practically be compelled to do it. Texas would not surrender her territory.

Very well, Mr. President. It is said that under article 11 of the covenant of the league of nations the council can only advise, and can not effectually carry out its advice. The decision of the council has been that Mexico is entitled to the Chamizal zone, and the council, following even the construction placed upon it by some Members of the Senate, advises that the most effectual means for carrying out the decision of the council and averting war is for Mexico to take possession of the Chamizal zone, and Mexico acquiesces in the advice and the orders of the council the United States has refused to recognize. In what position are we? Suppose upon the one hand that our customs guards, the police force of the State of El Paso, the El Paso rangers, thrown upon the border, refuse to allow a Mexican to put his foot upon that zone if he carries a gun—which they would do, I can say unhesitatingly. No Mexican coming across the line, crossing one of the international bridges, or crossing the bed of the Rio Grande would be allowed to land upon this side with a gun in his hand unless the American soldiers stood protecting him. Texas would never submit to it. Would the people of the United States agree that their soldiers should by force of arms prevent Texas maintaining its jurisdiction over its territory? Would any Senator here vote for the use of the United States forces, or would any Representative in the other branch of Congress vote for such use, to surrender to Mexico this territory, and to coerce the people of the State of Texas, and then go home to his constituents and ask reelection to this or the other body?

But what are the consequences? The Senator from Oklahoma very cheerfully informs us that there are none, that the only effect that this situation would have would be to compel the United States to refrain from ejecting Mexico or protecting her territory by force of arms for three months. And yet there in a distinct provision in article 1 that if by an act of war—not a declaration of war through the Congress of the United States, but by any act which may be construed as an act of war—the people of the United States undertake to defend their territory from what they consider to be an unjust decision of the council, we have declared war upon every nation of the world, whether it belongs to the league or whether it does not so belong. Whether it is a member of the league of nations or not, we agree that under those circumstances, if we defend our territory, even without a declaration of war, or if we allow a State force of rangers, or the police force of the State of Texas, to defend the Texas territory, that we have declared war against all the nations of the earth. We agree beforehand to the consequences. We agree that they may then, without committing an act of war against us at all, not only send their military forces but use all the economic and financial pressure which they can bring to bear and constitute an outlaw of this great Nation of ours.

Mr. President, suppose Mexico does not seek to take armed possession of this territory, but simply sends over her customs officers and raises the Mexican flag. How long would the people of the United States allow that flag to float over that terriory? How long would the people of the sovereign State of Texas submit to the customs guards and the police force of the city of Juarez, that great center of civilization upon our border, exercising jurisdiction within the city limits of El Paso, in the sovereign State of Texas, upon the soil of the United States of America? And yet you are powerless. Entering this league will tie your hands and shackle the people of Texas, who came into this Union under a treaty with the United States, reserving to themselves all the soil within their domain. True, Texas was admitted, after the treaty was under discussion, by a joint resolution, admitted as a sovereign State, with the rights not only of a sovereign State but with the right to constitute herself, when in her good judgment she saw fit, into five sovereign States of this Union, with the right of representation here and in the other body corresponding to her population. And yet entering into this proposed league, which you say works for the peace of the world, you not only tie your hands but, as I say, you shackle the people of the State of Texas, and you submit to the extension of the Carranzista civilization over the borders of the United States, to the wiping out of a portion of one of the cleanest, most progressive cities in the southwestern portion of this country. Do you think, Mr. President, that the people of the United States would submit to it? Possibly some of them would. Texas achieved her independence once. I do not speak for her now, but I think she is able to protect very largely the independence which her sons won.

Mr. President, it was insisted upon by a Senator whom we all recognize as an able lawyer, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], or rather, not so much insisted upon by that Senator as indirectly referred to by him and insisted upon by one of his colleagues sitting near his side, that under article 4 of the proposed covenant of the league of nations Canada, or one of the British colonies, could not become a member of the council of the league of nations without the consent of the United States. Read article 4 of the treaty, and you will see that it provides for the constitution of two characters of councilmen, and the constitution of the council in three different ways. First, there are five members of the council who are the perpetual members of the council—that is, always; Great Britain, France, Italy, the United States, and Japan shall have control of the council as long as the membership of five lasts, or unless the number of councilmen is, as thereafter provided, enlarged.

There is then a provision that other permanent members of the council may be constituted; and how? At the suggestion of the council itself and by the vote of a majority of the assembly. Those are the other permanent members of the council. Then the second class of councilmen, aside from those hereafter to be constituted as permanent members, are the temporary members of the council, whose replacement shall take place whenever the assembly so decide, purely temporary, and in the discretion of the assembly may be changed in one month, two months, three months, five months, one year, five years, or whenever in its discretion the assembly sees fit to change it; and the council has nothing to do with it. The United States on the council has nothing to do with the selection of the temporary members or the other four members of the council. The assembly itself selects them, and selects them in its discretion. There the United States may have a vote, and not elsewhere, and I say to Senators now that the letter that was written by the President of the United States and read into the Senate RECORD the other day by the Senator from Missouri, a letter signed by the President of the United States, Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George, to Sir William Borden, that Canada might be a member of this council, was signed then and there, when this provision as to the temporary selection of the four councilmen was written into this treaty.

That was the occasion for the signing of that letter. It was discussed then and there, and the understanding was that the four members who are mentioned were to be replaced at the first meeting of the assembly, as is here declared. The four members are to hold their offices at the discretion of the assembly after its first meeting. They are simply to hold until the first meeting, and at the first meeting the assembly itself chooses their successors, and in its discretion. To say that it does it by unanimous vote is to lug something into the treaty which is not written there, a construction different from the contemporaneous construction placed upon it; and hence the President of the United States, Lloyd-George, and Clemenceau signed the assurance in writing to Sir William Borden, which he presented for the purpose of procuring the acquiescence of the Canadian Parliament in the ratification of this treaty. The ratification was opposed until he could assure the Canadian Parliament that they should become a member of the council, and in proof of his assurance he presented to them the letter written and signed by the President of the United States and others at the time. It was given publicity then, published in the Canadian papers during the debates, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] secured it and read it into the RECORD. Those are the facts, as I understand them, and I have exhausted every possible means of securing the facts as they were.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana undertakes to differentiate; he undertakes to make exceptions; he undertakes to exercise his extraordinary faculty of dissection, taking to pieces and putting together an argument. With all his ingenuity bent upon the point at issue, he undertakes to show the difference between the suggestion thrown out by the President of the United States and that advocated or advised by Senators here as to the necessity of going to Germany in the event we make a change in the treaty; and upon this proposition I may now dwell for a moment, Mr. President, with reference to the effect upon the other nations of the world if we, the Senate of the United States, amend this treaty.

In so far as a textual amendment to the treaty is concerned, there is no question in my mind that it should be presented to Germany if we adopt it; and unless it is adopted by Germany, it might not be effective as to the United States. Then we are told that you can not secure from Germany such an amendment, or you must call the peace council together; and yet we heard the argument this morning that not only is the peace council still together considering the disposition of the territory of the earth; not only are they yet in session in Paris, but that behind them, with all the force of the Navy of the United States, and of the joint navies of the world, there stands the supreme war council to compel anything which the peace council may require. You have had an exhibition of it. You have seen the peace council, backed by the law council, compel Germany to change her constitution within the last three weeks, and do it without a question, by the signing of a protocol and filing it at Versailles, because, forsooth, some one claimed that since the constitution of Germany provided that some time hereafter Austrian countries might have representation in the German Reichstag it was a violation of the treaty provisions written here and that she must amend her constitution; and they compelled such amendment. It was not difficult at all.

We are told that you must not adopt an amendment of any kind, Mr. President, because you would have to summon together again the peace council; and yet the very men who are insisting upon that have reported favorably upon a peace treaty with France, Great Britain, and the United States in absolute violation of the terms of our treaty with Germany. And they have done it without asking Germany's consent. They have asked the Senate to consent to the treaty.

Of course, it provides that it shall become operative in the event Germany violates any of the sections of the treaty ending at section 43. The treaty itself provides that the league of nations shall deal with that proposition, and Germany has signed the treaty with the understanding that the league of nations would deal with the Rhineland and would deal with violations by her of these articles with reference to trespassing upon the Rhineland or trespassing upon other territory. She signed it and ratified it, and it is brought to us for ratification, and while it is pending here, without asking the consent of Germany, we have presented to us a treaty in absolute violation of it and setting it aside; and yet Senators say that we must not amend the treaty, because we must back the great peace council, which is meeting day by day, with Frank Polk representing the President of the United States at Paris and Versailles, backed, as I say, by the Great War council of the allied countries, which goes so far, in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, as to direct interference by the military forces of this country with our allies upon foreign territory without a declaration of war. And then you say you fear to change the treaty to protect the people of the United States and our interests, because, forsooth, we may be compelled to demand of Germany that she accept the change.

Mr. President, the argument does not appeal to me from any standpoint. I say now is the only chance, now is the only time that the Senate of the United States will have in which to voice the sentiments of this country, whose representatives we are, and write their protection into the treaty; and therefore I have no patience with the argument, from whatsoever source it may come, that we might be put to a little trouble if we amend it in accordance with what we believe to be the demands of the people and for the protection of our people, simply because we may be compelled to call the peace council together again after it has operated ineffectively for seven months. Such argument does not appeal to me from the standpoint of what I consider to be Americanism, nor does it appeal to me with any greater force from the standpoint of practicability. If it is practicable to compel a change of the constitution of Germany, without the United States calling upon her to do it, but simply through the voice of some self-constituted representative of the people of the United States in that matter, if it is practicable to secure a change of their constitution in that manner, certainly it is practicable, with the use of the naval and land forces of the United States, to secure any other thing which we demand.

You know, and I know, and every one of us knows, that Germany will accept any change which we may write in, and that every other nation of the world will not only accept it but they will welcome the United States into any league, where only the name of league, covenant, council, and assembly are mentioned, if the United States is a member of the assembly or the council, because what they want is no repudiation of foreign debts, what the people of the United States who are behind this treaty want is no repudiation of foreign debts. They are concerned with repudiation to-day, and the effort is made to befool the people of the United States with the cry that, "You must supply the needs of these foreign countries, you must operate through the league in supplying them, and you farmers will be able to dispose of your goods at high prices," and yet the consumers in this country are told by the President of the United States that we need this peace treaty to keep down the high cost of living. The people are approached by representatives of Morgan & Co., on the one hand, claiming that if they will join this league and refinance the world the farmers, the factories, and the workingmen of this country will derive benefit from joining the league, and that in itself because they hold $50,000,000 of the bonds of the city of Paris and also they hold $50,000,000 of Russian bonds and other bonds of the world practically. I say to you that I have never been one who has attacked the moneyed interests or vested interests or the business men of this country, but I say now that the business men of this country had best beware. Fasten this league upon the people of the country, and, in my judgment, the struggles will be so tremendous to break away from it within the next two years that we may have trouble here upon our own soil.

Of course we do not want to see the world bankrupt. Of course we do not want to see in France and Italy what we have seen in Russia—repudiation of national debt. Of course we want to see Czechoslovakia and the Slovene country and the other new nationalities which we are bringing into the world prosperous. Of course we do not want our own investors on this side of the ocean to lose the amounts which they have placed in foreign bonds. Of course we want the farmers and the producers of this country to secure a market for their products. We have an example now, that was discussed here this morning, of exactly how you are going to protect the farmers, the producers, the manufacturers, the people of this country. You are going to do it forever, if you join this league, as you are doing it now, with a joint high war council. That was the first war proposition in connection with article 9 of the treaty, and that is the objection in the French Assembly now, that the Bourgeois amendment was not adopted, and in lieu of that you simply provide that a staff might be appointed as a committee of the council to advise the council. Clemenceau and Bourgeois insisted at that time that a standing army should be under control of that staff for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the treaty. If you get into this league, you will have your staff exactly as you have your supreme war council to-day, with authority from some unknown source to land our marines on the Adriatic shore or the shores of Dalmatia to interfere with trouble or with disturbance foreign entirely to any of the interests of the people of the United States, a disturbance originating between two of our allies and not concerning any of our enemies.

Mr. President, Senators who make this argument are those whom Hudibras had in mind when he said—

> He could distinguish and divide
> A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.

And they call this argument for the league!

We are told very unctuously by the President of the United States, as reported in the press, from the platform in California and other States, that this is a league of peace; this a league for the small nations, a league of the small nations, a league for the protection of small nations.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. FALL. Not at all.

Mr. CURTIS. In the discussion of the question of amendments to the treaty the Senator stated a moment ago that if an amendment were made to the treaty it would have to be submitted to Germany for Germany's ratification.

Mr. FALL. Yes; I think it should be.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood that the Senator in his interview with the President took the position that if an amendment were made to the covenant of the league of nations it would not need confirmation or approval by the German Government, because the German Government is not a party to the league of nations. Do I understand him to occupy the same position now?

Mr. FALL. I entertain the same opinion, of course, and I thank the Senator from Kansas for calling my attention to it, because in hurrying from one subject to another, which I had under consideration before reaching the amendments which are pending before this body, I had intended to refer to that point and had overlooked it.

Mr. President, there are certain nations who, as soon as they ratify the treaty, are ipso facto members of the league. There are certain other nations who have been invited to join the league and several of whom have filed their acquiescence or their agreement in the terms of the league. Those are some of the smaller nations. There are other nations which have not been invited to become members, even, and as to whom we have no moral or legal obligation with reference to what the league should contain, if we should adopt this, at the time they may, if ever, be invited to become members or may make application of their own motion to become members. If Germany hereafter makes application for membership in the league she must make it as Mexico would make it, and the argument with reference to the necessity of presenting a proposed reservation to Germany would be exactly as strong as if the name "Mexico" were substituted in lieu of that of Germany. Mexico can only become a member of the league by making application to become such. She is not a member now and she is not invited to become a member at any time in the future.

It is true that, on the objection of Germany, even Brockdorff-Rantzau, in his letter to Clemenceau, insisted that a time limit should be fixed. First, his insistence was that Germany should be taken immediately into membership of the league and then that a time limit should be fixed when Germany might become a member of the league, and the answer to him was to the effect that Germany must convince the allied and associated powers that she would be good; that in due time, if she was good, if she performed the obligations of the league—the time limit required is 30 years—if she fulfilled the obligations, then she might become a member, but she can only become a member of the league by application for membership and by the vote of the then members. The objection to an amendment to the league covenant, now adopted or adopted at any time prior to the coming in of Germany, that it must be presented to Germany, has no more force than if the objection were made with reference to Mexico or any other country whatsoever who has not been invited to become a member. The matter answers itself. For the reason that the President did not appear to be clear upon it, I asked him if it were not a fact that we could adopt before Germany came in any amendment to the league covenant that the members of the league chose to adopt, and it was in answer to that question that he said that it had not struck him that way, but that, of course, I was correct.

So that it is a matter of no difference whether the Senate now, in the consideration of the ratification of this instrument, adopts an amendment or whether it adopts it six months after it is ratified in so far as Germany is concerned. When Germany makes her application to enter the league, she makes it as the league covenant then stands and knowing what it is. If she does not like the provisions of the league covenant, she has her recourse and makes no application for membership in the league. Mexico is in exactly the same condition. She was not invited to become a member.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. The superficial argument is that Germany, being a party to the treaty, and the league provision being a part of the treaty, the league provisions can not be changed without consulting her; but the obvious answer to that is that the provision of the treaty is divided into two parts, one part of which Germany is interested in and the other part of which Germany is not interested in.

Mr. FALL. Precisely.

Mr. KNOX. If Germany may in the future become interested in the first part and apply for membership, she may apply just as she finds it, and that is the case as to Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Precisely; Germany is exactly in the same condition as Mexico or any other country. Mexico would have the same right to say, "I had representatives over there and I investigated this matter at the time, and if you had invited me I would have come in. I have been waiting for an invitation; I have been waiting for an opportunity to come in. Now, you have changed the league covenant and have violated your good faith with me."

Mr. KNOX. Then the reply is, "You do not have to come in."

Mr. FALL. Yes; the reply is, "Stay out if you do not like it," and, Mr. President, that is what I hope we will do.

But the argument was made, as I have said, during the President's recent tour in California and other places, that the league covenants were for the small nations and by the small nations and that this was a league or a covenant of small nations; of course, having reference to other members. I have a little clipping, I think, showing the President's words:

> There were more cheers a moment later when he declared the treaty was founded on the rights of the weak rather than the power of the strong. It was a people's treaty, he said, not a statesman's treaty.

Mr. President, in some way, unknown to myself—as a matter of fact, I can only give a wild guess just how it happened to be sent in; it was done by inadvertence, of course—the Secretary of State, in transmitting certain information to the Foreign Relations Committee, after he had testified before that committee, sandwiched in between two matters which he had been asked to furnish a partial transcript of the proceedings of the conference on the league upon one occasion. I have it here before me. I shall not undertake to read it all, but Senators who are interested in the subject may find from the printed hearings before the committee, on page 295 and the following page or two and the preceding two or three pages, that there was a meeting of the little nations, presided over by the president of the conference, Mr. Clemenceau; and they will find that Mr. Hymans, the representative of Belgium, arose in that meeting and denounced the cut-and-dried program which had been presented to these little nations. They will also find that he was supported in his opposition by Calogeras, of Brazil, by representatives of other small nations, and finally by Sir William Borden, of Canada. The opposition was solely to the effect that the small nations of the earth were not properly recognized; that they had no voice in the formation of the league. Finally, the old "Tiger," of France, stung by the criticism, himself made a speech, and a portion of that I shall read, so that the people of California and others who heard the eloquent expressions of our President to the effect that this was a league of the small nations and for the small nations may understand exactly how it was formed and under what theory it was formed and by whom it was formed. Finally, as I say, stung by the reproaches, Premier Clemenceau, speaking in French, replied to the observations and suggestions of the delegates in a speech of which the following is a translation:

> As nobody else wishes to speak, I shall speak in my turn in order to try to justify the bureau. It requires this, for if it had ever flattered itself that it could satisfy everybody it would by now be thoroughly disillusioned.
> Sir Robert Borden—

> has reproached us, though in a very friendly way, for having come to a decision.

The comments of each one of the representatives of these countries were to the effect that somebody had a cut-and-dried program, and that they understood it was a free conference which they were summoned to attend. That was the comment and the opinion of Sir Robert Borden, of Hymans, of Calogeras, and the others, to which Mr. Clemenceau is replying.

> Well, we have decided, as regards the commissions, in the same way as we decided to summon the present conference. With your permission, I will remind you that it was we who decided that there should be a conference at Paris, and that the representatives of the countries interested should be summoned to attend it. I make no mystery of it—there is a conference of the great powers going on in the next room. Sir Robert Borden has the less reason to be unaware of it, since he yesterday did us the signal honor of making a statement before us on questions concerning the British colonies.

Now, if you want to get the Canadian note, agreeing that Canada should come in, if you will trace it back to this date, you will find that following that conference the note was written and signed.

> The five great powers whose action has to be justified before you today are in a position to justify it. The British prime minister just now reminded me that, on the day when the war ceased, the Allies had 12,000,000 men fighting on various fronts. This entitles them to consideration.
> * * * * * * *
> What crime have we committed? We have decided that, for our part—

That is, the five great nations—

> we would appoint two delegates each on the commission on the league of nations. I would beg Mr. Hymans and all those who followed him to let me keep to the point.

Objections were still going on in this placid little meeting—

> As soon as I indulgently allowed him to wander from it, as soon as the door was opened, everybody rushed in and discussed everything except the subject under discussion. It is my duty to guide the conference in its work in order to obtain a result.
> We have, therefore, decided to appoint two delegates each, and then—may I be pardoned for it—we have decided to ask you to appoint five delegates in common.

This is the league of small nations and this was the commission that wrote the league. This was the commission of 15 who were to write the league covenant which we are now considering. The President says it is a league of small nations made for the small nations and by the small nations, who outnumbered the five powers two, three, four to one in this conference, and who numbered about 20 in the conference as against 5; when the great powers appointed 2 members each and gave to the other 18 or 20 nations of the world only 5 representatives. That is the manner in which the small nations of the world wrote the articles which we are now considering in this so-called covenant of the league of nations, which the President tells the people of the United States was made for the small nations and for the protection of the small nations. Old Clemenceau had the courage to tell the truth. He said:

> I have heard Mr. Veniselos and many of you say "our voice will not be heard." How can you level such a reproach at us? Your voice will be all the better heard, because we are now arranging a means by which we can listen to each other.

Then he goes on to say, "If you can not get together and agree upon the 5 members we have allowed you out of the 15, we will name them for you; do as you please."

That is the satisfaction the small nations got, according to the record furnished us by the Secretary of State of the United States. It simply throws a little light upon what was going on in this conference, where everything that was said by the President and everyone else was received with acclaim and applause and approval. If you go into it, Mr. President, you will find that they did not have a meeting where there was not opposition and where the voices of the small nations were not smothered by the conference which Clemenceau admitted was going on in the adjoining room, and which was attended by the representatives of the four great powers, Mr. Pichon taking Clemenceau's place, that conference deciding what the little nations should take and what they might have and what they did get.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the Senator also remember the testimony before the committee—perhaps the Senator was going to refer to it——

Mr. FALL. I am glad to have the Senator call my attention to it, because I might have overlooked it.

Mr. KNOX. I hope the Senator will refer to it—in regard to the little nations wanting to object.

Mr. FALL. I have in mind the statement of Mr. Bullitt as he was testifying before the Foreign Relations Committee, from the documents which he had, and particularly when he was answering questions put to him by the learned Senator from Pennsylvania, when he gave us a picture of the adoption finally of the draft of the league of nations, when all over the hall there was objections, when the delegates from the other nations of the world were upon their feet protesting and objecting; but when the matter was being put through, as you have seen the steam roller operate in a Democratic convention, so all opposition was crushed and not a protest was allowed; not a voice was permitted to be heard, except that of some advocate of this cut-and-dried league made by the four powers in the adjoining room and forced upon the little nations of the world.

Where, now, I ask you, is Veniselos, the great Greek, recognized as one of the foremost statesmen of the world? He was there, and in his self-sacrifice, as the same record will show, and in his desire to maintain peace and harmony and to hold the small nations together, after he had been appointed on this commission, arose and said that he recognized the fact that Belgium had suffered even more than Greece and that he would yield to Belgium that she might have a voice in the league of nations. Where is he? Driven out of your league and your conference. By the action of whom? By the action of the American delegates to the peace conference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. I will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What does the Senator mean by Veniselos or Greece being driven out?

Mr. FALL. I mean that he would not and could not, with the support of his countrymen, accept the division of Thrace which the American delegates have insisted upon making. He could not in justice to his country or with the support of his countrymen accept the provision by which they turn over to Bulgaria, the enemy of Greece and the enemy in this war of the United States of America, a portion of Thrace which is Grecian.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator imply that Veniselos or Greece has repudiated the league of nations?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; that he has declined to sign it. That is the newspaper report. If the Senator has any other source of information I should like to have it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have, but not on my desk. I have it somewhere in my office or in my desk a statement from Veniselos.

Mr. FALL. Oh, that is an old statement, Mr. President. The Senator can rake up some old statement; but, as I said, Veniselos was so anxious to carry out this peace treaty to assist in doing something to bring about and to maintain the peace of the world that in this very meeting he arose and resigned the position which had been accorded him as a member of this commission and insisted that Belgium should be substituted, because she had been left out, and she had suffered more than any of the other nations present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why does the Senator designate as an old statement the one I am referring to by Veniselos?

Mr. FALL. Because all that I have found that the Senator has produced here yet were out of date. [Laughter in the galleries.] If the Senator has anything new, I will extend my apologies to him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly the Senator may not be referring to what I am.

Mr. FALL. Possibly not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am referring to a recent statement made by Veniselos, repudiating and denying the widespread reports that he had turned against the league of nations. He says, on the other hand, that while he has been disappointed in some of the decisions of the council, he is as firmly in support of the league of nations as he has been at any time.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it seems to me the Senator does not appreciate what he is doing or what he is talking about. Here is the general proposition for the constitution of a league of nations. The treaty of peace with reference to Thrace and Greece is not specifically embraced in the proposition which is now pending before us. The treaty which I am referring to is the treaty by which we are turning over a portion of Thrace to Bulgaria; and Veniselos has repudiated it, and they have not yet signified their intention of joining this league.

I have here a cablegram, or a copy of one. I can not vouch for its authenticity. It is as authentic as any other information that I have had here or seen produced here.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1919.

NATIONAL HERALD, New York:

Thracian question Friday. Americans have insisted postpone Thracian solution until Congress decides whether accept Constantinople mandate.

Whether you, the Congress of the United States, being led into the ratification of this treaty here, are going to accept the Constantinople mandate, take over Turkey, and send your sons over there to guard the Turkish harems; and a postponement has been insisted upon by the American delegates until you have decided upon your Constantinople mandate under a treaty to which you have not yet agreed.

Greece insisted immediate settlement, but Americans would agree immediate settlement by depriving Greece of whole Thrace except Xanthi Goumouljina districts. Greece regretfully obliged yield before night. Meantime, Thracian question became pure question America against Greece, and situation now completely changed, because Wilson seems decided now deprive Greece from Thrace. Interest regarding Thrace now centered Washington instead Paris. Veniselos probably leaves Paris late next week for visiting London, Manchester, Liverpool. Invited by them. Large movement now operating, chiefly by Americans, for preserving territorial unity Turkish Empire. Morgenthau very active, supported by missionaries.

Roberts College! As one of the bright newspapers of this country said a few days since in a short paragraph, Mr. President, Roberts College may not have turned out any very well-known or eloquent ministers of the Gospel, but it has been most successful in turning out politicians.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to read the statement of Veniselos, so that I can see whether it is the one which he condemns?

Mr. FALL. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On September 4 there was placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] the following statement just made by Veniselos:

Premier Veniselos, of Greece, in a letter to the American ambassador at Paris made public to-day by the State Department, denied reports published in America that he had publicly stated his loss of confidence in the league of nations because of the American attitude with regard to Thrace. He asked that President Wilson be advised that he had undergone no change of sentiment with regard to the proposed world society.

After quoting from American press reports as to his attitude, and recalling that "the question went so far even as to occupy the Senate," Premier Veniselos wrote:

"I desire, therefore, in view of the importance attached to the above news, to state categorically that I have not made the above statement, and it really grieves me to know that I could have been thought capable of it.

"Notwithstanding the disappointment I may feel because of the Thracian question—a very vital one for Greece—my views regarding the league of nations—a world-wide structure to which I have also contributed in the measure of my ability—have not and could not change."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it may dawn on the Senator some day that there is a treaty now supposed to be in process of negotiation concerning Thrace and Greece, which will have to come before this country possibly at a later day, and that the provisions of that treaty also will possibly come under the operations of this league of nations, if it is ever formed. If the Senator, who has hurried out, will read more of the record which I have just read he will see something of Premier Veniselos's sentiments with reference to the league of nations as it is constituted there.

Why, of course they will accept the league of nations proposition generally, however it may be written, because the five great nations sit in that other room. Greece is bankrupt, and she wants American money to finance her, just as Italy and these other countries are bankrupt, and want American money to finance them. I said to begin with, sir, that they would accept the league of nations. There is not one of them that will not accept it. You can strike out from the first clause of the first article down to the signatures, and just leave there a council and assembly, and nothing as to what they are to do, give them no power whatsoever, leave simply the skeleton of a council, with the United States a member of a world council, and every nation in the world will accept it. There is not one of them that will not accept it. Greece will accept it, of course. Greece will not accept the Thracian settlement—that is, she will not do so without a revolution—just as Italy does not dare to accept the Wilson settlement of Fiume, because she faces a revolution.

My attention is called to the fact that the denial read by the Senator from Nebraska was simply Veniselos's denial that he had made a public statement, which is true. I caught it as it was read.

Mr. President, there has been very much criticism of the delay in the consideration of this treaty. I say "very much criticism"—there has been natural criticism. Many of the people of the United States, of course, do not understand yet why the Senate has not voted upon some of the provisions, at any rate, contained in the treaty which is under consideration. I am going to refer in a short time to some of the provisions in this treaty which have not yet been referred to, except incidentally, in all the discussion which has gone on concerning it; and I think I shall be able to show in a very few minutes' discussion that the people of the United States do not yet know what this treaty is after all this discussion.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations labored—that is, the majority members did; I will acquit the minority members of any labor in connection with the consideration of this treaty—but the majority members of this committee labored as assiduously as any Senators ever did in the consideration of any matter of such supreme importance. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, just take into consideration the fact that upon the organization of this body a railroad bill was under consideration, which has never yet been reported out of the committee. Just consider the enormous number of bills of a domestic character, concerning domestic legislation, which are still being considered by committees of this body, and neither the newspapers nor others are criticizing the delay. They are perfectly satisfied to await the result of the efforts of the committees, based upon such information as they may glean from different sources, recognizing the magnitude of the task with which the committees are confronted. And yet, Mr. President, even in the great matter of supreme importance to the people of the United States, the one great domestic question, the settlement of the distribution problem, as based upon the operation of the transportation system of this country, that great question, as important as it is to the present and the future of this country, is a mere bagatelle in comparison with the consideration of a matter of this supreme importance touching our foreign relations. The matter of railroads, or any other matter of domestic regulation, may be considered and one theory adopted to-day, and, in the wisdom of the Congress of the United States, it may be amended or rejected or repealed and a new system adopted to-morrow.

It is possibly true that the action of this body in initiating legislation upon railroad problems might disturb the business of this country temporarily or for such time as would be necessary to repeal or amend the official action taken by the Congress. But that is a domestic matter. We deal with it as we please. The committee takes a bill and, after consideration, reports it back, or amends it and reports it, or refuses to touch it, as they please. A temporary scar may be made upon the body politic; but the people of the United States know what they want and will settle these matters which they have to settle, and only a temporary scar will be the result, whether the Underwood-Simmons Act is in force or the McKinley Act is upon the statute books. You can repeal one or the other and you can affect temporarily, or somewhat permanently, all of the business interests of the people of the United States. But the people of the United States are doing it, and if they do not want it they can repeal it; they can elect a Congress that will repeal it; but in dealing with foreign relations, Mr. President, we are tying the hands of the people of this country for unnumbered generations, and we are going to become one member of a council of nine who will have our foreign relations in its possession, until the people of the United States at the polls elect a Congress that will denounce it and constitute an army who will stand back of that Congress and enforce the denunciation.

You can not make a mistake either of commission or omission with reference to the foreign relations of a country without the possibility of constituting a scar which will never be eradicated from the political system of that Government. You can not commit an act of omission or of commission which may not tear one of the members of your corporate body from the others. When you are dealing with foreign relations you are dealing with other countries; you are surrendering your sovereignty to a certain extent even in an ordinary treaty. When you are dealing with this character of treaty, when you are constituting yourself only one of a number who have jurisdiction over your foreign relations you are placing yourself and the unborn generations of the United States in the hands of foreigners. And you can not expect that they will break the shackles which you have placed upon their hands.

The Austrian treaty is intertwined with this treaty; the Polish treaty is intertwined with it; the present French and English treaties are intertwined with it, or, as the President says, are linked with it, and I ask you if the Foreign Relations Committee has had an opportunity or time to investigate either of those treaties? They did not, because the minority members of the committee were sitting there with their mouths closed, so far as any argument upon any proposition was concerned, and voting "No" whenever a proposition was made to require evidence from any source or to hold a hearing which might cast light upon the problems involved in this treaty; threatening the majority members with the hostile majority in this body that the treaty would be taken from the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee unless we hurried to some decision and placed the treaty before the Senate. And so, Mr. President, I for one voted to take it out. I would have accepted the challenge without hesitation and reported the treaty back without recommendations and let the Senate sweat with it and let the ignorance existing among those supporting the administration be displayed even more clearly than it has been shown here upon the floor to-day. What information they have they have been compelled to accept as it was brought out by the majority Members of the Senate, and they have not assimilated that.

Mr. President, I am somewhat wearied, but I shall proceed to another phase of this matter, as I suggested a few moments ago, and in the discussion which I shall now engage in for a short time I am going to call attention to one article of this treaty, or a part of it, which has only incidentally been referred to in any debate or anywhere and upon which no hearing has been had or could be had. This so-called peace treaty, Mr. President, is like all Gaul, divided into three parts; and I might say that it has been prepared by a Cæsar, as the former Cæsar assisted in dividing Gaul.

The first portion of the treaty has been under full discussion; that is, the so-called covenant of the league of nations. When it first made its appearance before us, when the President cheerfully crossed the ocean and summoned the Foreign Relations Committee to meet him at the White House and presented them with the draft of the new covenant of the league of nations, he called it then the "constitution" of the league. After he returned and the second draft was sent over he had changed its name, and it was known as the "covenant" of the league. And well might the change be made, because if it still bore the designation of "constitution" of the league, which it is, Mr. President, some of the constitutional rules and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States would be more readily invoked, or when invoked would be more apparent for the consideration even of the layman; and very well might it have been and was that the name even of the child was changed as it neared maturity, and is now known as the "covenant" rather than the "constitution." Mr. President, I could hear old Daniel Webster and Henry Clay and the fathers of this country, expounders of the Constitution of the United States, take this matter and dissect it, if it still bore the name of "constitution," and what they said, which has been written down in history for the guidance, we supposed, of the Americans of all future generations, would be so applicable to it, had it yet borne the name of the "constitution," Mr. President, that even a layman, as I say, would have been compelled to halt when reading their discussions, so apropos were they to the provisions of this covenant.

But suffice it to say, Mr. President, that the covenant of the league of nations is intended to and does constitute another body, with power to interfere in one way or another with all the foreign relations of the United States of America, with everything touching the external relations or interests, commerce, invention, transportation, treaties, acts of Congress, even, which might be construed as in one way or another affecting treaties, all within the jurisdiction of this league of nations as affecting the foreign relations of this country. You are, then, asked to surrender our sovereignty and to delegate the power which the people of the United States have placed in the hands of the Senate to a foreign body with reference to the management of the foreign relations of this country.

Very well, Mr. President. But later on in this treaty, and properly following the league of nations provision, had it not been for the attempt, as it is, insiduously to place between these two instruments, because they are separate instruments, certain rules and regulations and geographical lines—had it not been for the insidious attempt to place the main body of the treaty between the two articles, the one to which I have referred and the one to which I will now refer, part 13, it would at one glance be perfectly apparent to Senators and to the people of the United States that upon the one hand, having entered the league of nations under article 1 and delegated to foreign powers the management of your foreign affairs, or interference with your foreign affairs, you are now, by part 13, asked to delegate to a foreign body the management of all your domestic affairs. There is no limitation whatsoever upon the authority of what is here designated as the "labor council;" there is no limitation whatsoever upon their authority to deal with any question of domestic concern.

Through the provisions of part 13, Mr. President, a council within a council or a league within a league is provided for, which is to meet and consider any questions which might, by any stretch of the imagination, touch any domestic question arising in any of the countries of the world, because the labor problem enters into every domestic problem—transportation, railroads, Government ownership, telegraphic lines, telephone lines, factories, manufactories, agriculture—every possible phase of domestic life is touched, and touched more or less seriously, by the labor question. I am not one of those who oppose union labor. I said here, I think, two years ago that in my judgment it might be best for all the labor of this entire country to be unionized and to be allowed to deal collectively and to be dealt with collectively. But, Mr. President, the people of the United States have elected a Congress of the United States to deal with their domestic questions, and labor takes part in every one of those elections. Labor so far as unionized has not gone into politics, and the leaders of labor in this country, in my judgment, have pursued a very shrewd course in not going into politics themselves. Their methods have been much more effective by simply indorsing one candidate or another of the one party or the other as that candidate might more nearly represent what the labor men of his district desire.

With no opposition to union labor in this country, except as some of the employers insist upon an open shop, with no opposition anywhere, I have thought that it would be best for the other people of the country, the consumers and those who did not belong to the masses of organized labor, or of unorganized labor, if labor were generally organized in this country, and, possibly, better if it went into politics, because, Mr. President, elect Samuel Gompers to the Senate of the United States and he would be under oath to perform his duty to the people of the United States under the Constitution of the United States; and if I know him, he would do it. Place the responsibility upon him which we have here and he, and the other labor men—because the leaders are generally good Americans—will perform the duty which they have sworn to perform if they come here as Members of this body. I have no fear, then, of labor, organized or unorganized, in politics or out of it.

But, Mr. President, let me say to you what the provision with reference to this labor council does, first, to the laboring man of the United States. A few years ago the Congress of the United States adopted an amendment, offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], declaring unequivocally as the opinion, as the voice, as the determination of the Congress of the United States, and therefore of the United States itself, that labor was not a commodity.

Now, take the labor articles in article 13, and see the declaration of principles there. The man who is responsible for that cut the heart out of the labor constitution which the Congress of the United States had written for the labor of this country. They adopted the provision that "labor is not merely a commodity." Ask any laboring man to go to his dictionary, if he has any doubt on the subject as to what "merely" means; ask him to go and look in his dictionary, and he does not have to secure a labor dictionary, to know that the heart is cut out of the constitution of American labor in the very first provision or declaration with reference to labor contained in part 13.

Mr. President, American labor needs no assistance from the other labor of the world. It is the most efficient labor known throughout the world to-day, and we all recognize, of course, the fact that it is due to the efficiency of American labor that America to-day occupies the position she does among the other nations of the world, due to the fact that we are a country of unlimited natural resources and that we had the most efficient labor in the world to develop them. We ask nothing of any other labor.

Among the provisions with reference to the power or the authority of the labor assembly when it is called and considers a question such as, we will say, for instance, immigration or naturalization or tariff or transportation or wages or hours of labor, or any other subject whatsoever, it is true that there is a provision that when that assembly shall have adopted a recommendation upon the one hand, or written a draft convention upon the other, and any nation rejects the proposition, that it shall not become operative as to such nation. Having adopted them, that nation submits itself to the coercion of the foreign nations of the earth, who can compel the carrying out of the plan which may have been submitted. I should like to ask the laboring men of this country where they are going to be on the immigration proposition. I should like to hear from them on that proposition. Many of them, and I believe a majority of organized labor of the country, for several years have been requesting the Congress of the United States to limit immigration, to restrict immigration in this country. As yet Congress has not done it.

A convention was called to be held in Washington in October, next month, to pass upon certain questions, though I notice in the last few days that the date of the convention has been postponed. It is true that in the agenda of the first meeting the provision of immigration is not to be considered. There is nothing, however, to limit the consideration of the convention or the operation of the convention upon the subjects provided in the agenda, so the question of immigration might be considered if it were brought up at the first meeting.

Now, unless beforehand the Congress of the United States shall have passed a law restricting immigration in accordance with the desires of many of its citizens, of whom I will say I am one—unless prior to action by the international labor congress the United States shall have passed a law affecting immigration, and the international labor congress that deals with the subject—and all the other nations of the world want unrestricted immigration in the United States as well as elsewhere—if they adopt a program to that effect and it is not affirmatively rejected by the Congress of the United States, it becomes fastened upon this country forever, and there is no means by which we could ever, through congressional action or otherwise than by a denunciation of the treaty itself, get rid of the provision thus fastened upon us. The same argument applies to the tariff and every other possible matter of consideration. Once having adopted it or acquiesced in the principle of it, we are bound forever. That is another reason why I oppose the proposition.

Above and beyond and over that, Mr. President, is the fact that under the constitution as it is written the matter of the delegates to this conference is not American. First, how many delegates will Great Britain have? The matter has been referred to and discussed at some length here in the discussion of the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. In the league of nations assembly Great Britain has six and the United States has one. In the labor council Great Britain has 24 and the United States 4.

Again, in the constitution, in the matter of the selection of the delegates from each country, where they are four in number the Government itself selects two, and then from organized labor, not labor in general but from organized labor, they name one, and from the organized employers—the Manufacturers' Association of the United States, I suppose, the greatest organization of employers—the United States is compelled to accept the fourth. Then when they vote, instead of voting for the United States of America, they vote each man for himself, as he pleases.

In the discussion of this very important matter in Paris, opposed as it was by the various delegates from other countries, another matter was suggested, and that is the heart of the situation as I see it. It was suggested by a resolution offered by the French and the Italian delegates that agriculture should not be overlooked if there were to be a classification of the delegates to the labor conference; that agriculture itself, the greatest industry of the world and the industry upon which the laboring man of all classes and the employer of all classes and the consumer, of course, is sooner or later dependent—agriculture, the great interest of the world—should be represented if there was to be a distinction among the delegates. That proposition was rejected upon the theory that the two government delegates would represent agriculture. The two government delegates appointed by the power elected by the people of the United States—the labor organizations, union men, and those not belonging to any organizations—could represent agriculture, but they could not represent the employer upon the one hand nor union labor upon the other.

Mr. President, I know that some of the more prominent labor men, leaders of organized labor in the United States of America, are opposed to this proposition as it is submitted, and I am satisfied in my mind that when organized labor or unorganized labor in this country understands that this is an un-American proposition absolutely they will reject the entire proposition for this reason if for no other, if there were not these specific objections, to which I have called attention briefly. The American laboring man is an American, Mr. President, unless he is a foreign striker.

Mr. President, sandwiched in between the world organization for the regulation of all the external relations of the United States, upon the one hand, in article 1 and part 13 of the treaty, which provides for the organization of a body with absolute power to control every domestic policy of the United States, upon the other, comes the body of the treaty with Germany. In the first speech that I made upon this subject in the Senate I called attention, as have others, to the absurdity of many of the provisions of the so-called peace treaty. That the Senate should be called upon, among other things, to give a moral guaranty that they will see that Germany returns to somebody in South America the skull of some old nigger; that the Senate of the United States should by signing this treaty incur a moral obligation on the part of the people of the United States to compel the performance of such an agreement is an absolute absurdity and can be classed as nothing else. Attention has been called to many similar absurdities, and I am not going into them at this time.

The articles of the covenant of the league of nations, to reiterate, provide for the handling of the foreign affairs of this country hereafter—not only of this country but of the world—and obligate us in the future to enter into every possible dispute, such as the question now confronting us with reference to Trau and the other questions pending on the Adriatic and Dalmatia, including Fiume and that in the interior. All over the Balkan Peninsula, down into the deserts of Persia and Egypt, from one corner of the globe to the other, we are to be dragged forever until we denounce the treaty; we are to be dragged into all the possible troubles between the King of Hedjaz and those who supported him for a while, but who now want the American Government to set up for them a separate government somewhere between Medina and Mecca. This is for the future that we are to be obligated under the league of nations. Meantime the President undertook a short time since to differentiate between a moral and a legal obligation in the discussion of the treaty. My head began to swim at that time, but I have never yet been able to so fix my equilibrium that, in dealing with foreign relations or with my duty under my oath to my country, I can differentiate between a legal and a moral obligation. Other people have a clearer vision.

In the body of the proposed treaty they proceed first to regulate the geographical lines of Germany, Belgium, Poland, the free city of Danzig, and so forth, and so forth, and so forth, ad infinitum. Being obligated, if we agree to the covenant of the league, to engage in the future in all disputes, if we agree to become members of the commissions which are to arrange boundary lines and pass upon plebiscites and use their discretion as to which country they will hereafter, at some time in the future, deliver over thousands of people and hundreds of square miles of territory—should we agree without qualification to enter into all these matters, then our trouble commences from the very day we sign the treaty.

Of course, it may be said, Mr. President, that we are already engaged in this work. We are, but not by the advice nor the consent of the Senate of the United States. We are told that there have been American commissioners appointed upon some of the commissions provided for in the treaty. We are told by the public press, which is our usual and fruitful source of information, that a reparation commissioner was appointed a few days since; that Mr. Rathbone, I believe, an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, had been appointed by the President of the United States as a member of the reparation commission, and was proceeding to London and would begin the performance of his duties.

Mr. President, I asked the President of the United States two or three questions concerning certain commissions which were provided for in the treaty, and I have here his answers. I wish to call attention to some of them.

15. Was it or is it now contemplated that, of the commission composed of five members to be chosen by the council of the league of nations for the government of the Saar Basin, one of said commission to be a citizen of France—

That is provided in the treaty—

one a native of the Saar Basin and not a native of France—

The second commissioner provided for—and the three other members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany, there should be one American commissioner among the membership of five; and if so, why is it necessary that America should be represented upon this commission?

This is one of the questions I asked. It does not apply to the first amendment which, on my suggestion, the committee has reported to the treaty; but I wanted an answer from the President, of course, or I would not have asked the question. I wanted to see along what lines his mind was running with reference to this commission, if he had given any attention to it at all. His answer is that:

15. No mention was made in connection with the settlement of the Saar Basin of the service of an American member of the commission of five to be set up there.

No mention was made of it whatever. Therefore, in so far as we know from the President of the United States, there will be no American member of the commission or there need not be any; there is no particular reason for one, because it was not mentioned; and yet of all the important commissions provided for in the treaty the Saar Basin commission is the first, or, at least, the second. It may be said that the more important is the reparation commission; but in so far as the performance of the particular duties imposed upon the league of nations or by the peace treaty with reference to the reparation to France herself and the repayment to Italy in the matter of coal particularly are concerned, it is the most important commission provided for in the treaty. If the reparation commission is first, then, of all the numerous commissions provided for—30 or 40 or 50 in number, followed by innumerable commissions in each of the other treaties—certainly the Saar Basin commission is second in importance; and yet the question of the appointment of a disinterested American was not even considered! Three commissioners were to be appointed by the council of the league of nations, but the discussion of the appointment of a disinterested American was never even suggested.

Now, let us see about the others. My next question was:

16. Why should the United States be represented by one member of the commission for the settling of the new frontier lines of Belgium and Germany under articles under sections 34 and 35?

If there is such a thing as an unimportant commission, that is an entirely unimportant commission, in my mind, except in so far as we ourselves take part in it, and agree upon this line, and are morally obligated to enforce the decision of the commission.

The President's answer to my question was:

16. It was deemed wise that the United States should be represented by one member of the commission for settling the new frontier lines of Belgium and Germany because of the universal opinion that America's representative would add to the commission a useful element of entirely disinterested judgment.

In at least the second most important commission, which is to have absolute governing power over a whole people for 15 or more years, the question of the appointment of an American was not even suggested; but in the matter of the appointment of an entirely unimportant commission, simply to settle within 15 or 20 days, I think—within a few weeks, at any rate, after the ratification of this treaty—to settle within that short period of time the boundary line for a short distance between Belgium and Germany, it was necessary to put a representative of the United States on that commission, because the United States was a disinterested country. Comment is unnecessary. The mere repetition of the question and answer, it seems to me, followed by the next question, is all the comment that is necessary.

My next question to the President was:

17. As article 48 of the treaty provides for a boundary commission for the Saar Basin, to be composed of five members, one to be appointed directly by France and one directly by Germany, why was it not provided that the other three be nationals of other powers?

This is another commission for the Saar Basin—

Should each be named in the article to be appointed by some particular country, as is done with reference to the other two, rather than to leave the selection of such three to the council of the league of nations with the restrictive provisions that the said three should be selected from nationals of other powers than France and Germany?

The President's answer was:

17. The choice of the commission for the Saar Basin was left to the council of the league of nations, because the Saar Basin is for 15 years to be directly under the care and direction of the league of nations.

The personnel of the commission which is the governing body for 15 years was not discussed; but it was necessary to provide that the league of nations should name the commission to determine the boundaries because of the fact that the governing commission, whose personnel was not considered at all, should be under the league of nations for a period of years.

The eighteenth question was as follows:

SETTLEMENT OF BOUNDARY DISPUTES.

18. Why was it necessary to provide in article 83 that of the commission of seven members to fix the boundaries between Poland and the Czecho-Slovak State, one should be named by Poland, one by such Czecho-Slovak State, and the other five named by the five allied and associated powers, rather than that certain countries, specifically named, should nominate the five as well as the two?

To that the President answered:

18. Article 83 does, in effect, provide that five of the members of the commission of seven to fix the boundaries between Poland and Czecho-slovakia should be nominated by certain countries, because there are five principal allied and associated powers, and the nomination of five representatives by those powers necessarily means the nomination of one representative by each of those powers.

Mr. President, if the President knew the purpose and intent in the appointment of these commissions, and if anyone desires to ascertain that information, I will say frankly that he can not acquire it from the answers of the President. He is completely at sea about it. It was an entirely unimportant matter, and yet, if his definition of a moral obligation has any weight, when we go on this commission we have incurred a moral obligation.

Mr. President, who names these commissions?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Before the Senator leaves the matter which he is so interestingly discussing I should like to call his attention to a fact which of course he must have noticed in his study of the treaty, namely, that the settlement of international boundaries, like the settlement of line-fence disputes, generally suits neither party to the controversy, and the umpire or the judge or the referee generally falls into disrepute with both disputants. Accordingly, the treaty has running through it a constant thread of purpose on the part of the European powers to put the United States in the position of referee in these line-fence disputes between the new nations, so that it will be we and not the powers of Europe who will bear the odium of whatever decision is made, and we correspondingly will suffer by reason of those decisions in our trade relations with both parties to the dispute, whereas in the case of the Saar Valley, where the discerning French know exactly what they intend to do, they can get along very well without us.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, there has been no anxiety displayed upon the part of the other nations of the world to see that we have any of the trade which is referred to from time to time. In my judgment, the sole purpose of having the United States tied on any of these commissions is to impose upon us the moral obligation to enforce certain geographical lines, to assume certain obligations, to see that the people within certain geographical lines are not allowed to get out of them, and that there is no repudiation of the present indebtedness of such countries. That, in my judgment, is the prime purpose and the sole purpose of those who have written certain clauses in this treaty. I acquit the President of the United States of any such purpose, because I do not think he knows what the clauses mean at all; nor is anyone else able to tell me why it is that in the case of one commission the members should be appointed by the five principal allied and associated powers, in the case of another commission by the council of the league of nations, and in the case of another commission its members should be mentioned in the treaty itself.

Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the majority of the amendments, something like 30 in number. They are simply directed to the elimination of the words "and associated" where they occur in connection with the appointment by the principal allied and associated powers of the members of commissions. The motion as adopted by the committee and reported to the Senate is to strike out the words "and associated," which will eliminate the United States. It will leave the other principal powers free to appoint their own commissions and leave the United States out of it. I for one do not desire to underwrite foreign indebtedness nor to become responsible hereafter for the geographical division of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It strikes me, Mr. President, that when we get through dealing with the racial question here in the United States, and other questions of like importance, such as the great labor problems which are confronting us now, we may well sublet the job of looking after the labor of the world or delegating forever to foreign powers or foreign representatives the management of the Army and Navy of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, is not the discussion which went on here this morning with reference to the landing of the troops at Trau absolutely convincing to any Senator here as to exactly what will happen if this league of nations is formed? If your high council, or whatever you choose to call it, now sitting in Paris, can order the troops of the United States to Trau or elsewhere to take part in a difficulty with which we have nothing to do, except under the orders of some one else, what in the name of all that is holy will the league of nations do to us hereafter? And yet we are met with the assertion—not argument, but the assertion—that the league of nations has no power!

Who conferred the power upon the board which ordered the marines to Trau? Who conferred the power upon anyone whomsoever to order the soldiers of the United States to Siberia and maintain them there? And yet we are confronted by the so-called argument that if we go into this league and delegate our powers to declare war, still that is an absurdity, that we do not delegate anything, that all those powers still remain in our hands; and because we are at war with one nation they maintain, upon the other hand, that the Constitution of the United States is absolutely suspended, and that the President of the United States is a greater dictator with more power than was ever assumed even by Peter the Great of Russia or by William of Germany!

Mr. President, as I have said, I do not care to go into a full discussion of each of these amendments. I have explained shortly the purpose of them. It is simply and solely my purpose, as far as possible, to eliminate the United States from any participation in or any moral obligation to the present difficulties in Europe, to get our soldiers home, to get our ships back to our shores, and to attend to our own business for a while. This is the purpose. Of course I shall discuss at some length upon another occasion the amendment with reference to the reparation commission.

Now, I shall only say that by this amendment it is sought to provide not that the United States shall not have a representative upon the commission—and in the last speech that the Senator from Nebraska made, he wasted a good deal of his time in telling us what horrible things would happen to us if my amendment should be adopted, and we were not represented on the reparation commission. There is no such amendment pending at all. The amendment is simply to provide that the American representative on the reparation commission shall not vote upon any question whatsoever except the matter of the disposition of the German shipping unless he is directly instructed by his Government to cast his vote. He sits there at all times, but votes upon no other question affecting the other countries of the world or affecting our country unless he is directed in that particular matter as to how to cast his vote. This is simply following one of the provisions of the treaty as written, which is to the effect that in the event it becomes a question of scaling an indebtedness now or hereafter agreed to be paid by Germany, the American representative shall not vote upon it until he has had instructions from his country. This is simply to provide that he shall have similar instructions before he casts his vote in any other matter. Why? Because the Germans in their protest—and I will say now that it might be very well for some Senators to inform themselves as to what took place and what is taking place. If they had read some of the German literature presented before the peace council—and I have no reference to anything coming from Germany from any other source except the official documents which were presented to the peace commission in Von Brockdorff-Rantzau's counter proposition submitted to Clemenceau, and to which Clemenceau and the Allies agreed in part—it might be very instructive. I do not know that anything would be; but it would be interesting, possibly, at any rate, if some one could be induced to consider and to discuss some of the very propositions which were brought up between Germany and the Allies in the discussion of the final draft of the treaty.

Mr. President, one of the matters referred to by Von Brockdorff-Rantzau was this, that your reparation commission has more authority and more power than was ever wielded by the Kaiser, by the Reichstag, by the State, by the Empire, or by all combined. It has power to levy war, power to levy taxation, power to fix indebtedness, power to go into the homes of the people of the district, power to fix tariffs, power to interfere in the daily affairs of Germany. Such power, Mr. President, was never vested in any commission or any emperor or any autocrat. Why, even Carranza by decree does not attempt to usurp such power.

Mr. President, this is the commission upon which it is proposed that the United States shall have a member for 30 years! We guarantee to back up that commission with an army; and we not only are to furnish American troops to protect the commission and to enforce its commands, but the commission itself is given the power to recruit military forces. I am not speaking for Germany; I am speaking for Americanism, and the people of the United States of America. When they understand that these commissions provide for matters of this kind, and obligate the United States to the performance of duties of this kind, the people of the United States of America will elect a Congress that will reject the treaty if this Congress approves and ratifies it.

I give notice now that during the consideration of this treaty I shall offer an amendment to strike out Part XIII; that I shall also move to strike out of articles 118 and 119 the words "and Associated Powers"; and I shall refuse, in so far as I am concerned, to allow the United States to take a mandate under article 119, when the President of the United States has already agreed to the division of the mandate countries. I shall refuse to become a party to a farce, sir, by which it is solemnly proposed that we shall enter now into an agreement for the governing of the South African colonies of Damaraland, German Southwest Africa, Togoland, Nigeria, and the Kamerun, when to-day the British flag is flying over the German Southwest colonies, and the French flag, by agreement with Great Britain, is flying over the Kamerun and Togoland, already divided.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEWBERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Did I understand the Senator to say that an agreement regarding the German colonies had been made between Great Britain and France, or some of the other powers, and the President?

Mr. FALL. I call the attention of the Senator to Leslie's Weekly of August 16, 1919, with photographs:

Down comes the German flag; up goes the French.

Referring to Togoland and the Kamerun.

Mr. THOMAS. I can understand, of course, the hauling down of the German flag and the substitution of some other flag; but the statement that it was done by agreement with the President of the United States was somewhat astonishing to me.

Mr. FALL. Just a moment, Mr. President. I have the evidence here.

Mr. THOMAS. I never heard the statement made before.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, I think I can furnish him with the answer.

Question 13, which I asked the President of the United States to answer, was as follows:

Has there as yet been any agreement, tentative or otherwise, as to the disposition or the government of such overseas possessions—

That is, the German South African colonies, as the preceding questions will show—or any part of same to which the United States is a party?

Answer. There has been a provisional agreement as to the disposition of these overseas possessions, whose confirmation and execution is dependent upon the approval of the league of nations, and the United States is a party to that provisional agreement.

The provisional agreement which I referred to was the one referred to here, and upon which I had information—that is, that France had agreed to allow Great Britain to take Damaraland and German Southwest Africa and that Great Britain had agreed with France that she should take the Kamerun and Togoland, provided she left to Great Britain a strip on the coast known as the Nigerian strip. That was the agreement which has been carried out.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. If this treaty is ratified, by its terms the overseas possessions of Germany become vested in the principal allied and associated powers, of whom we are one. In other words, we will get an undivided one-fifth of the sovereignty of all those overseas possessions. The question that occurred to me was this: The instant the treaty is ratified, that is the property of the United States. How can the property of the United States and the sovereignty of the United States over that property be conveyed away in advance by any agreement to which Congress is not a party?

Mr. FALL. I will admit that the Senator from Pennsylvania can not secure from me an answer to that question which would be satisfactory to him or satisfactory to me. I asked some questions of the President along that line, and I asked him what kind of title we took. The President seemed to think that we took identically the same title under article 118 and under article 119; but I believe he did make a statement before the committee—possibly the Senator may recall it—to the effect that it had been some time since he had practiced law.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I will refresh the recollection of the Senator from New Mexico by recalling to him that I asked the President if it was not the fact that we took title in fee to an undivided fifth part of the German overseas possessions, and he hastened to qualify his acquiescence in that statement by saying "As trustees, however."

Mr. FALL. Exactly; and he so answered the questions. He gives the same answer with reference to the title under article 118 and the title under article 119; but I will not take time to read it, as it is in the RECORD. Under article 118, as to the German possessions in Europe, Germany simply renounces, outside of certain boundaries, and does not cede at all. But under article 119, as to her overseas possessions, South Africa and the Caroline Islands, and others, she cedes, she renounces in favor of the five allied and associated powers; and it is the wording of that cession that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has referred to. And, as he very well says, the principles laid down in the Diamond cases and the Insular cases and the other cases decided by our Supreme Court with reference to the character of title which we had as to the Philippine Islands, for instance, they later applied, as the Senator will recall, to the Zulu Islands.

Mr. KNOX. And Porto Rico.

Mr. FALL. Yes. I am speaking of the Philippines, because we had to have a second treaty. In the first treaty Spain ceded directly. In the second treaty, with reference to the Zulus, she used exactly the same language as is used here. She renounced in favor of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that when we took title we became obligated to protect those territories as the owner thereof, with governmental duties to perform; and we have a one-fifth undivided interest in these overseas possessions of Germany, exactly as we had the entire interest in the Philippines, if the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is law.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I do not believe the President meant to convey the idea that there was any technical trusteeship here, because there is not. The cession is direct. He could not by any declaration upon his own part alter the terms of the treaty, which is to be passed on by the Senate. The law of the case is contained within the four corners of this document, if it is ratified. I think his idea of trusteeship was explained by an answer he made to me. I called for an expression of opinion upon his part as to what portions of these overseas possessions the United States would likely retain—whether it was not understood, at least tentatively, that we were to get something out of it—and I remember that he most enthusiastically replied that he would certainly hope that the United States would take nothing, with which I entirely agreed.

Mr. FALL. Yes; and, of course, I am in accord with the Senator. The President said:

Article 118 of the peace treaty, Part IV, under which Germany renounces all her rights to territory formerly belonging to herself or to her allies was understood, so far as special provision was not made in the treaty itself for its disposition, as constituting the principal allied and associated powers the authority by which such disposition should ultimately be determined. It conveys no title to those powers, but merely intrusts the disposition of the territory in question to their decision.

Article 119, section 1, of Part IV, reads:

"Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions."

This appears to be a direct cession of the German overseas possessions to the principal allied and associated powers, of course, the United States being the associated power. What character of title does the United States receive to any part of the overseas possessions ceded by Germany through article 119?

Germany's renunciation in favor of the principal allied and associated powers of her rights and titles to her overseas possessions is meant similarly to operate as vesting in those powers a trusteeship with respect to their final disposition and government.

But yet the President, during the course of this very interesting conversation, was asked as to whose duty it would be to protect these territories, and he announced it would be the duty of the mandatory to protect them.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, it is probably idle to discuss the various contradictions in opinion which took place in the course of the interrogatories directed to the President at the conference at the White House; but, as a matter of fact, I ask the Senator from New Mexico, if he does not find, whenever we attempt to seek information with reference to any of the involved stipulations of this instrument, that we are dealing wholly with an instrument of faith. When we ask what such and such a thing means, we are told that we hope it means this, that, or the other; when we ask how to interpret the instructions given in one section of the treaty, we are told that the intention was so and so; but there is absolutely no clear thread of construction running through it, and no one who can interpret it correctly. We are asked to take it absolutely as a matter of faith.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it is apparent to anyone who has discussed the matter, who has considered it at all in good faith, that there is no representative of the United States who was in Paris who knows anything about the treaty, except with reference to one or two or three articles which he might himself have had something to do with. There was no one to bring all the work together. The President was obsessed with the idea of the shell of a league of nations hanging around article 10, which was his original proposition to the A B C, with reference to Latin-American affairs.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, even on those very points the two or three sections with which the so-called experts who came before us dealt at Paris, we were unable to get any information. The most ingenious and probably the most intellectual of all those witnesses who appeared before us, after he had gone back to New York, in relating his experiences before the committee, said that he ducked beneath the lily pads whenever the committee came perilously near to any question which would expose the real situation.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the impression made upon the mind of the Senator from New Hampshire, of course, is similar to that which I have brought away from all these so-called conferences or from any contact with anyone who assumed to know anything about the treaty. The President, as I have said, was absorbed in his labors for the future of the world, just as Alexander the First was laboring under the belief that he must prepare the world for the millennium, and that he was the forerunner of the Messiah on the face of the earth. The President of the United States was undoubtedly laboring in Paris for the creation of a league which he believed would bring about peace and good fellowship, and he devoted his attention to that labor and to the details of this treaty. How, in construing it and working it out, it might affect the interests of the people of the United States I think he gave no consideration at all. His mind was wrapped up in the great vision he had seen, just as that of Alexander the First was under the influence of Madame Krüdener or some one else.

Mr. President, the short discussion with reference to these South African colonies has, I think, illustrated or at least evinced the reason which I shall offer later for moving to strike out the words "and associated" in article 119. In other words, if the United States is to get nothing of the German colonies, as she is not to get anything, and they have already been divided up, Japan having gotten a part, Great Britain a portion, Portugal a part, France a part, and they are all actively in process of division or have been divided, and the flags of these different nations are flying over them, if there is to be an amendment to the league covenant restricting or in any way reserving the right of the United States Congress to pass upon mandates for any foreign countries, then certainly, logically, we should strike out the provision by which the United States takes an undivided one-fifth interest in property which already has been given away with the acquiescence of the President of the United States.

COAL-MINING SITUATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I tried this morning to bring to the attention of the Senate what I considered to be a very serious matter, but I was unable to get the recognition of the Chair. I now send to the desk a letter sent me by the president of the Pennsylvania Coal & Coke Corporation, of New York, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA COAL & COKE CORPORATION,
New York, September 26, 1919.

Hon. J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing herewith copy of letter dated September 24, addressed to me as chairman of the Central Pennsylvania Coal Producers' Association by our general secretary, a man for whose judgment I have great respect. You will notice it is his opinion that the action of the United Mine Workers in convention at Cleveland precludes all hope of averting a nation-wide strike in the bituminous and possibly the anthracite coal industry.

I also inclose copy of report of the scale committee of the United Mine Workers adopted at Cleveland, and copy of resolution adopted at the same convention in regard to the nationalization of coal mines.

The mine workers' scale committee and the operators' scale committee are now in conference at Buffalo. It is inconceivable that the operators will grant the demands as presented, and yet there is no alternative to accepting them but a nation-wide coal strike. The operators would be guilty of a national crime if they acceded to the demands in order to avert a strike, as the industries and public of the country can not afford to pay the additional cost that the proposed scale would cause. Roughly, I estimate that it would increase the cost of mining bituminous coal $1.50 per ton and of anthracite $2.50 per ton. While a large percentage of this additional cost would be in wages, a considerable proportion would be due to increased cost of the overhead expenses, such as pumping and ventilation.

It can not be truthfully said that the eight-hour day, which is now prevailing, works a hardship on the laboring man; a six-hour day would decrease production 25 per cent. To-day there is not enough anthracite coal mined in an eight-hour day to supply the demands, and reducing it by 25 per cent would unquestionably cause a disastrous shortage regardless of the increase in price. Neither the public nor the industries of the country can afford to add $1.50 to the cost of bituminous coal; it would cost the railroads alone from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 additional; all public utilities would suffer in the same proportion, most of them already overburdened with high costs for fuel, material, and labor.

Establishing a standard scale of $8 for ordinary labor would upset the whole economic condition of the country, and yet this is what is demanded by the United Mine Workers. The facts in regard to the present cost of production of coal throughout the United States are in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission. The National Coal Association and the Fuel Administration have accurate cost figures for the year 1918. Applying the proposed scale to figures easily obtainable by your committee would demonstrate to you that my estimates of increased costs are not far out of the way.

The country is now in the throes of industrial unrest due to numerous strikes, the most serious the steel strike. A committee is now investigating the causes of that strike, but after the strike has started. In the case of the United Mine Workers and the coal producers of the country there is no question of recognition of organized labor; the majority of the operators have been trading with organized labor and entering into scale agreements for many years. It now appears that the radical element has secured control of the United Mine Workers' organization and is determined to force either nationalization of coal mines or a wage scale and working conditions that would demoralize the whole industrial situation. The issue involved is, in my judgment, far greater than that of the steel situation, as coal is fundamentally the base of our whole industrial situation.

I trust you will not think that I am presenting my views for any other reason than that of the general public interest in this important proposition. Your committee may be helpful in averting a calamity through the publicity that can be given the whole matter. I find very few people who realize the danger confronting the country through this issue.

Very respectfully, yours,

D. H. WATKINS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am not going to take the time of the Senate this evening to speak upon this letter. To-morrow morning I shall ask that the Secretary read the report of the scale committee, which includes the demands by the United Mine Workers, together with the reply of the coal-mine operators. I merely wish to state briefly that this simply amounts to a demand to stand and deliver, an ultimatum to the coal miners of the country, with no opportunity for arbitration or contest. The American people can not stand an advance of $1.50 a ton in bituminous coal and $2.50 a ton in anthracite, which is largely a domestic coal.

The attention of the Senate should be paid not only to these unreasonable demands, but also to the entire situation. I shall speak briefly to-morrow upon the investigation of this subject which has been made by the Committee on Interstate Commerce and what has been accomplished by it, and I shall also ask the Secretary to read to-morrow the two statements which I have on my desk.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, October 1, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 30, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, exercise, we pray Thee, Thy holy influence upon the hearts of Thy children, to still unholy strife, contentions and unwarranted discontent, that riots, strikes, and unlawful influences may pass away.

The world-wide war, with a victory for humanity, liberty, justice, peace, is going, and the patriotism of our gallant soldiers warrants patriotism in peace, that brotherly love with all its blessings may come to every individual, every home and state throughout the nation. To the glory and honor of Thy holy name, in Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POTASH.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read in my time a letter, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POTASH REDUCTION CO.,
Omaha, Nebr., September 24, 1919.

Hon. MOSES P. KINKAID, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: We are again arranging to open our potash plant at Hoffland, Nebr. Will probably start operations about the 10th of October. It seems that the expected potash from abroad is not coming in as the people in the East and South expected. Therefore we are again ready to do what we can to help out the country and supply the country as far as possible with potash for fertilizer for use next spring. This change in the situation shows already the fallacy of the United States relying on foreign nations for any necessities that we can produce at home if properly safeguarded. If Congress had responded to our appeal and safeguarded the industry for a while, the domestic plants would all have been kept running and a sufficient supply of potash would have been produced to take care of the country's needs as far as the seeding season of 1920 is concerned, but as no action was taken, practically all of the potash plants were obliged to close for the want of a market for the product, and now, of course, there will not be time to make up a sufficient supply of potash between now and next spring to fill requirements, but we will do the best we can.

In this connection we want the post office reestablished at Hoffland. Will you please take this matter up with the proper post-office authorities, so that the post office may be reestablished? The records of the office at that point when our plant was operating no doubt will justify the appointment of a postmaster at this time. It is very inconvenient for us at present, while we are putting our plant in order and bringing in more or less equipment and transacting such business as is necessary to commence operations. We are employing about 40 men at this time in this work. When our plant was in operation before we employed from 200 to 250 employees. When we commence operations, about the 10th of October, it will again take a large force. We trust that we may be favored with post-office facilities as early as possible.

Thanking you for the many efforts you have made in the interests of the potash industry in your district and for the many favors extended to us, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

T. E. STEVENS, President.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, on reading this letter last Saturday I at once telegraphed to the writer, asking his permission to have the same read on the floor of this House, and his reply telegram thereto was delivered to me yesterday. It says:

You have my permission to use my letter of the 24th in any way you see fit. It is already being proven that withholding temporary protection to the potash industry will cost the farmer more in the next few years of unsettled conditions than if the industry had been safeguarded and allowed to proceed with confidence in perfecting and cheapening the process of manufacture and utilizing the by-products.

It is pertinent to here mention that it was only six weeks ago when, by reason of the importations of Alsatian and German potash into the United States falling far short of the arrangements which had been made therefor by American importers, that Nebraska producers of potash were enabled to sell the entire product they had on hand when the armistice was signed, amounting to $1,500,000 worth, but which they had thereafter been obliged to hold on account of the prospects that the foreign product would be furnished in amounts ample for the domestic consumption at a lower price than what they had produced during the war. And there is no telling now when the American consumers of potash will be safe in relying upon importations from foreign countries in adequate amounts to supply the demand. It is also perfectly clear that if American plants are to be shut out of the business permanently for want of legislation to tide them over while improving their economies sufficiently to successfully compete with the German and Alsatian mines—if the American industry is to be stifled in its infancy—our consumers of potash will be bound to pay such prices as the German Kali syndicate and monopoly may deem it not injudicious to impose. They will be required to pay just as high a price as this monopoly may estimate will not result in the industry in America being developed as a permanent competitor in our home market. But I have it by hearsay that two other Nebraska plants have recently resumed operation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for two minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Nebraska be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 208. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2910. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee," approved April 5, 1916.

LANDING OF MARINES IN DALMATIA.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on the morning of September 24 I called the attention of the House to the use of the armed forces of the United States on the Dalmatian coast without authority from the Congress of the United States against a nation with which we were at peace. The suggestion that our forces had been so used was resented on the Democratic side of the House, and I was asked whether or not I had any authority whatever for making the statement that our forces had been so used. It is now admitted that American forces were used on the Dalmatian coast in a military activity against a nation that until that day was our ally and against which Congress up to this day has not declared war. It was stated by way of explanation on yesterday that as a matter of fact our troops were not ordered by the Executive of the United States to engage in that act of war, but that the order was given to our forces by a foreign authority.

Mr. Speaker, I would require indisputable evidence that the President of the United States had, in a secret conference behind closed doors with four or five other men, consented that during his absence from Europe men of other countries might use the armed forces of the United States as they might see fit, or in their discretion. It is unbelievable that the President of the United States would do any such thing. It would be so violative of his oath of office, so violative of the rights of the people of the United States, so violative of the rights of the Congress of the United States, which is the only power under our Constitution that can use the armed forces of the United States against a nation with which we are at peace, that I hesitate to believe that the President has done anything of the kind. Yet the Secretary of the Navy says that it was done without his knowledge or his consent. In any event, these forces were used without the knowledge or consent of the Congress, without the knowledge or consent of the American people, and it is a miracle that we are not to-day at war with Italy. Our armed forces are still there, and it is said are still subject to the same powers that ordered their activities on the 23d of this month. It is also said in the same connection that Italy is prepared to resent any further interferences with her activities and her purposes on the Dalmatian coast, and with respect to the ultimate disposition of Fiume. It seems to me in all calmness that the people of this country have a right at this time to have an explanation from the President of the United States as to the use of our arms against the people of Italy in thwarting their purposes or interfering with their business—a country with which we are at peace, and in a land thus occupied as victors when the armistice was signed, and so far removed from us that it is none of our business. Are we to be involved in war without our consent? Are we to be involved in war at the dictate of Lloyd-George, Georges Clemenceau, and Woodrow Wilson, or, in his absence, of Col. House? Is it possible that we have so far forgotten that we have a fundamental law to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the people of the United States that a single individual, or a group of foreigners with his consent and without authority from us, may use our armed forces, involving our lives, our limbs, and our property? I repeat that it is the duty of the President to make explanation to the people of the United States and apology to the people of Italy for the incident on the Dalmatian coast. The incident can not pass by shifting responsibility from the President to the council in Paris, or from the council in Paris back to the President. The President, and he alone, is responsible to the people of the United States for this incident.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did the gentleman introduce a resolution on this subject?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. There is a resolution pending in another body.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I noticed that a resolution was introduced in the Senate a few days ago, but that no reply has been received from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is true. There are statements made by the Secretary of the Navy, to one effect on yesterday and to another effect to-day, in the newspapers.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman said a resolution had been introduced in the Senate. Has any resolution been adopted by either House?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand there was a Senate resolution which was adopted.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman said it had been introduced. I wondered whether it had been adopted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It was a Senate resolution.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Adopted?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Adopted.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is too serious a matter to be passed over lightly. It is of such grave consequence that the people of this country have a right to know how they surrendered their control of the power to declare a state of war and when and with whom they are to be engaged in war.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAYS. Has the Government of Italy registered any objection to any action taken by those troops?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Whether it has or not does not affect the question. Whether they hesitate to register an objection, because of the power of the United States, does not relieve us from the odium that attaches to the use of our arms against a former ally and a weaker nation than ourselves.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. The Italian Government is probably able to judge whether it is injured or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman from Utah will not urge as an apology for the use of our arms that the injury to Italy was not great. It might have involved us in war, and the incident has not yet passed.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if he would consider that we had been damaged if we had been treated by the Italians as our sailors and marines have treated the Italians in this matter?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, if Italian armed forces had landed on the American coast and had done what there is evidence to show was done on the Dalmatian coast, we would be at war with Italy or Italy's contingent so landing on the coast would now be wiped out.

Mr. MAYS. Does the gentleman claim that the Dalmatian coast is a part of Italy?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; but Italy was in a victor possession.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand the fact to be that the Italian Navy was detailed to police one-third part of the Dalmatian coast, the American Navy another section, and the British Navy another section. These marines who landed were a part of the American forces and were detailed to police the coast, and no part of the territory belongs to Italy, and Italy can have no cause of offense. It was done just as we are maintaining an army on the German front to police that territory. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Gentlemen on the Democratic side are easily satisfied if they applaud that explanation of the use of our armed forces.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I get that account from the newspaper press.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to know from the gentleman from Missouri and from the President of the United States by what authority were the armed forces of the United States designated to police certain portions of the Dalmatian coast?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The same as they were to police the German frontier.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no; we were at war with Germany but not with Italy, and Italy was in a victor's possession of the Dalmatian coast at the signing of the armistice.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes to make some remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, on July 19, 1917, we declared war against Austria-Hungary, and authorized the President to use the armed forces of the United States to carry on that war. The resolution declaring war authorized him to invade Austria and occupy with our forces the territory of Austria-Hungary to its uttermost part. That resolution is still in force and effect, and under it the President of the United States, without any possible question, has the absolute legal right to send our Army and Navy into Austrian territory and to maintain them there until peace is signed.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; let me develop this further. At the close of the actual hostilities an armistice was entered into in pursuance of which and of our declaration of war our Government assumed certain obligations and responsibilities. Among others we took the responsibility of preserving the existing status of Austria-Hungary until peace should be signed. Peace has not yet been concluded. The obligations imposed upon the United States Government by her declaration of war and by the terms of the armistice are still in force. Those are facts which can not be denied.

The Italians who are asserting authority in Dalmatia and other parts of former Austro-Hungarian territory are proceeding against the will of their Government. They are proceeding without its consent. They are, so far as it is concerned, buccaneers and outlaws. They are, so far as the Governments who are concerned therein, international outlaws.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Has it escaped the gentleman from Alabama that the Italian Government is supporting the buccaneer, or whatever he may be called——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It has escaped my attention as it has everyone else who has investigated the matter. [Laughter.] The fact is just to the contrary; the Italian Government has frowned upon the mad venture of D'Annunzio and his buccaneer crowd. They have told him that he is acting against the best interests of Italy in the course that he is taking. The forces which have invaded Dalmatia have no more countenance from the Italian Government than Walker and his crew of filibusters had from the United States when they invaded Nicaragua. In what they have done they are at war with their own country as they are with the United States and all other civilized countries of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not propose to be held up. I will yield if I see fit.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, if I am not to have the privilege of proceeding, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject, so that the gentleman from Massachusetts may read it if he does not care to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The Italian Government has been greatly embarrassed and compromised by the course of the D'Annunzio forces. They have compromised the good faith of the Italian nation. Their Government endeavored to restrain them in their mad adventure, but they would listen neither to reason nor authority. Their Government has commanded them to vacate Fiume, but though they have put themselves in the position of outlaws they yet have the support of a section of Italian public sentiment and the Government is reluctant to wage war on them as it might easily cost thousands of lives and greatly jeopardize public order in Italy. The course of the Nitti Government in disavowing the action of the D'Annunzio forces has been sustained by an overwhelming vote of the Italian Parliament. It may therefore well be said that D'Annunzio is not supported by the majority sentiment of the Italian people. Military operations on our part or on the part of our associated Governments not only can not be construed as unfriendly to the Italian Government but are in line with their desire and request.

By the terms of the armistice as well as by virtue of having destroyed the authority of Austria-Hungary over Dalmatia, the United States has assumed not merely a legal obligation to maintain the existing status and to protect the inhabitants until they are finally disposed of by a treaty of peace, but has assumed a moral obligation of the highest order so to do. If we should abandon the Dalmatians to the rapacity of any band of filibusters which might have the power and disposition to take possession we would fail in a high duty owed to them, to ourselves, and to the world. We are in honor bound to protect them because we have destroyed the authority of their previous Government. To fail to do so will put us on the level of a policeman who would turn his back while a thug robs a peaceful citizen. We can not afford to do this. The honor and good name of our country demand action. Our good faith and humanity are pledged to it. I should be ashamed of my country if it should coldly leave the Dalmatian people at the mercy of brigands.

But there is another phase of this question to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Under the Constitution of the United States the President is Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. It has been argued with great force that the power of the President as Commander in Chief can neither be restrained, limited, nor controlled by action of Congress. Eminent lawyers are said to hold to this opinion. I may be permitted to say that I do not agree with them. I hold that Congress is supreme over the Army and Navy and has power to direct the President in the exercise of his functions as Commander in Chief. However, it is undoubtedly true that until Congress does act—until Congress attempts to direct the Commander in Chief—he is free to use his discretion. Without action by Congress the President bombarded Tampico; without congressional action he sent an army 250 miles into Mexico in pursuit of Villa; without congressional action he sent our troops into Siberia. In the absence of congressional action the President may order our Army and Navy to and fro in the world as freely as within the bounds of the United States—he may send the Navy to-morrow to bombard London.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] complains that the President may involve us in war. I do not remember to have heard any complaints from the gentleman over the action of the President in sending our forces into Mexico and into Siberia. Such actions of the President were in pursuance of his general powers, not of any declaration of war or express authority of Congress. But the presence of our troops in Dalmatia is due to express congressional authorization—the declaration of war against Austria-Hungary. The Constitution of the United States confers upon the President the power to involve us in war; that is, war in fact if not war in law. The gentleman's complaint lies against the Constitution, not against the President for the exercise of his functions as Commander in Chief.

Congress has never attempted by any general law to limit, control, or circumscribe the President in the exercise of his functions as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Whether Congress has the power to do so remains as yet, as I have said, perhaps a matter of uncertainty. Suffice it to say that if Congress has any such power it has never exercised it nor has such power been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States. The question is as yet an open one.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] complains bitterly of the exercise by the President of the discretion which is clearly reposed in him by the Constitution and the law as it now is, yet he makes no offer to take away the President's discretion. The gentleman occupies an important place in this House. He is chairman of its most important committee and a recognized leader of his party. I assume that he speaks for his party in his criticism of the President. Now, then, I challenge him and his party—they are in control of both Houses of Congress—to put through a measure subjecting the President to the direction of Congress in the exercise of his functions as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. I challenge them to limit the discretion of the President to direct his control over the Army and Navy. I challenge them to action instead of cavilling. Dare they make an issue with the President before the American people in the effort to limit his power? Dare they to require that the President shall have the consent of Congress before using our Army and Navy in such manner as might result in war?

The gentleman from Kansas and his party have had it in their power for months to force the bringing home of our troops from Siberia through control of appropriations. They have not dared to do it. For months they have had the power to order our troops home from Europe as well as Siberia. They have not dared to do it. They are content, it seems, to go on caviling and nagging.

COLD-STORAGE LEGISLATION.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, the cold-storage bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9521, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RICKETTS: Page 8, line 9, after the word "than" strike out "one" and insert "three" in lieu thereof.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on yesterday I offered an amendment carrying a maximum and minimum penalty for any violation of this legislation, which was defeated. The purpose of this penalty, of course, is to have the provisions of the law observed by those engaged in the cold-storage business. I submit, gentlemen of the committee, that the maximum penalty of $1,000 and one year in the penitentiary is entirely inadequate to enforce a strict observance of the provisions of this bill, and I have sought by this amendment to increase the imprisonment from one year to three years, and I sincerely trust this committee will consider this amendment seriously. Everyone knows that when a man is sent to a Federal prison or to a State prison that he gets so much time off for good behavior, and we are not going to have any trouble, in my judgment, in this bill with the small fellows who are engaged in the cold-storage business. Our trouble is going to be to hold the packers of the country in line so as not to hoard the foodstuffs of this country and withhold them from the markets of the country and thus force upon the people prices that are not warranted. I sincerely trust the members of this committee will consider this most seriously. I offer it in the utmost good faith.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman will pardon me, before his amendment is adopted ought it not to be amended so as to strike out the words "one year" and add "three years"? It would not read right to say "three year."

Mr. RICKETTS. Probably that is right.

Mr. RUCKER. I make that suggestion.

Mr. RICKETTS. The amendment is to strike out "one year" and insert in lieu thereof "three years," page 8, line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, is the amendment spoken of by the gentleman from Ohio pending and has it been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It is pending.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there is always a difference of opinion as to the penalty to be imposed in matters of this kind. The opinion of the committee is positive to the effect that there ought not to be a minimum penalty. The gentleman from Ohio on yesterday offered an amendment providing a minimum penalty and a maximum penalty. Our opinion is that there ought not to be a minimum penalty, and the gentleman has evidently abandoned that, and perhaps I should not speak of it. There is always opposition to a very heavy penalty, because it makes convictions difficult. A jury hesitates to convict in case a penalty that may be imposed is very severe, and I may say that it is the judgment of those who have given attention to these matters that violations of law are best prevented by reasonable penalties and certainty of conviction. The certainty of detection and conviction are the great deterrents to crime. The size of the penalty has a lesser influence.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion about the question here that is raised——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me——

Mr. HULINGS. With reference to the imprisonment of a corporation. The word "prison" in the bill refers to any individual, partnership, corporation, or association?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Everyone knows that a corporation can not be imprisoned. Section 14, the next section, relates to persons who can be held personally responsible.

Mr. HULINGS. Then what good is the imprisonment part of the bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is another question, and the gentleman will pardon me if I confine myself to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. That matter of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks will come under the next section.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. In the event the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio carries changing the penalty from $1,000 to $3,000——

Mr. RICKETTS. I do not intend that; it is from one year to three years.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. I am impressed by the suggestion made by the gentleman with reference to the maximum penalty. My observation is that whenever a penalty is so severe as not to have the moral support and sentiment back of it it is impossible to enforce. But does the gentleman think that in the case of some person who should willfully and defiantly violate this law and suffer a punishment of perhaps a $50 fine, and again violates the law and repeatedly violates the law, that the power lodged in the court or jury to assess a three-year sentence would be excessive?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is a matter of opinion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RUCKER. I think it would be entirely proper.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And while I am speaking largely for myself, I feel that I may express the opinion of the members of the Committee on Agriculture. They are not determined to retain this section respecting the amount of punishment just as it is. It is the judgment of the committee that the punishment provided is enough, but it is a matter in which the judgment of this Committee of the Whole is perhaps better than the judgment of the members of the Committee on Agriculture, and I am entirely willing to leave it to the judgment of this large committee. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RICKETTS. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Michigan if the penalty should be increased from one year to three years if there is still a discretion in the court to impose a penalty?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes; a discretion to impose a penalty. It is only a question of the best administration of the law. I wish simply to repeat what I have said, that in my judgment the certainty of conviction deters the commission of crime more than does the severity of the punishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think——

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention of the Chair to the fact that the debate on the section and all amendments thereto was closed yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of that.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Was the debate closed on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware of that.

Mr. HAUGEN. The section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CANNON. You can not close it on all amendments, but on the discussion of amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will ask for more than an extension of time of two minutes, because there is a very important matter here that ought to be discussed for a few minutes in addition to that. I will ask the gentleman if he will not ask for six minutes instead of two?

Mr. DOWELL. I only asked for this because I wanted a few moments on this amendment. I did not know the debate had closed.

Mr. HAUGEN. Debate was closed, but I ask unanimous consent that debate close now in 10 minutes on the section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] asks unanimous consent that debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should be adopted, if you will note from the reading of this provision the punishment is $1,000, or not to exceed $1,000, or imprisonment. Now, under this provision it is not necessary to imprison at all, but it seems to me if we are going to make this law effective at all, in cases where a punishment should be inflicted, we should have sufficient penalty that it would be recognized by the violators. And I can see no reason why there should be objection to leaving it to the discretion of the court to give not to exceed three years' penalty under a law of this character. It seems to me if this law is to be of any benefit, we must have sufficient penalty that it will not be violated with impunity.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the penalty clause, having reference to imprisonment, would never be enforced for violation of section 13, for the simple reason that it will be nearly in all cases a corporation that violates the section?

Mr. DOWELL. But under the provisions I think the individuals can be imprisoned. But, at any rate, there are aggravated cases where the court ought to inflict the maximum penalty, and I do not believe one year is sufficient if there is a continued and persistent violation of this law. And I believe if we are going to enforce the law, as it seems to me we ought to do, we should put sufficient penalty into it that the violator will understand what the penalty means. I favor the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] is recognized.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, for these reasons: From what little time and study and attention I have given the matter of administration of criminal law, and I have had a little experience along that line, and I have studied the matter some and have tried to get the experience of others in the courts through the years, one fact stands out as thoroughly demonstrated, and that is that the deterrent effect of the enforcement of criminal statutes does not lie in the severity of the penalty but lies in the certainty of conviction and punishment.

Now, this is true, with every criminal statute: Unless the criminal statute and the penalty are in proper ratio with the sense of justice of the community, and unless the public sentiment approves of a particular penalty as a punishment for a particular act, you can not enforce it, or, at least, it has the tendency to make its enforcement more difficult. So your ideal criminal statute and your ideal penalty is that penalty which is in perfect accord with the sense of justice of the community. If your penalty is too severe, or can be too severe, your juries are apt not to convict or less apt to convict. Oh, but, they say, we leave it in the discretion of the judge. But the effect is the same whether it is left within the discretion of the judge or not, because the juries will say it is possible under this statute for them to impose this too severe a penalty. So for the sake of getting the best deterrent effect of the enforcement of the criminal statute, which is the certainty of punishment, it is always best to put your penalty too light rather than too heavy; make it too lenient rather than too severe.

Now, dealing with the class of men who are engaged in the packing business, the fact of being convicted and the fact of being sent to the penitentiary is the thing that will deter. Whether you send them for one year or three years, one year will be just as deterrent as three. Take the membership of this House, for instance, and measuring them by my own feelings, if I were in danger of being convicted and sent to the penitentiary, the thing that would frighten me would be the fact of being sent there at all, not the length of time. After you sent me there it would be largely a matter of indifference with me, and, I think, with you, whether we were sent there for one year or three years. Yet, if you vote for one year you come nearer, in my judgment, making your penalty commensurate with the sense of justice of the community. Now, again——

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. On the basis of ordinary logic, why not make it one day, then?

Mr. VENABLE. Because your penalty must be commensurate with the sense of justice of your community. The sense of justice of your community would be outraged if you made it outrageously too little. The ideal penalty is the penalty that will be sustained by the sense of justice of the community. One day would possibly have no deterrent effect, because it would be too trifling, but when you come up to the point where the penalty means actual punishment then the tendency should be to make it too little rather than too heavy.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does not the gentleman know that 75 per cent of the ptomaine poisoning in this country among the people comes from the use of tainted meat? Now, suppose that the cold-storage monopoly could keep their meats in cold storage for a longer period than 12 months, and that the meat would deteriorate and become tainted. Do you think three years' punishment would be too much to inflict upon the people engaged in that business?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Page 8, line 9, after the word "both"——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. RICKETTS. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; I am offering another amendment. Let the pending amendment be voted on first, and then I will offer mine.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pending amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICKETTS: Page 8, line 9, after the word "than," strike out "one" and insert "three" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How long is this debate on this cold-storage bill going to last?

The CHAIRMAN. I think the gentleman from Missouri is too experienced a parliamentarian to put such a question as that to the present occupant of the chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is the fourth day of argument on a bill that ought to have been enacted in two hours.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, on page 8, line 6, to strike out the figure "4." But, first, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent for one minute to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment read first.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 8, line 6, strike out the figure "4."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request that he may proceed for one minute?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, calling the attention of the membership of the committee to this section 13, it seeks to enumerate what provisions are held liable for penalty, and I call the attention of the membership of the committee to the fact that section 4 applies only to the Secretary of Agriculture and could have no application to anybody else.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman is wrong about that. It imposes a duty upon him as to marking.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday a new section was added, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WELLING. I move to amend by adding to the numeral on page 8, line 6, the numeral "11 (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to renumber the sections.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELLING: Page 8, line 6, after the figures "11," insert "11 (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUCKER: After the word "any," in line 13, page 8, insert "agent, representative, or officer of a corporation or other."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That in construing or administering the provisions of this act, or any regulation thereunder, whenever the act, omission, or failure of any person acting for an individual, partnership, corporation, or association within the scope of his office, employment, or agency, or other authority granted him, or in him, is in violation of this act, such individual, partnership, corporation, or association, as well as such person, shall be guilty of such violation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for section 14.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers a substitute for section 14, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 14 and insert:

SEC. 14. That in construing or administering the provisions of this act, or any regulation thereof, whenever any person subject to the provisions of this act, or any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person, acting for or employed by such person, alone or with any other person, shall willfully do or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be in violation of any provision of this act, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or shall aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of such violation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the amendment which is offered is a motion to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. It would have to be in that form—to strike out and insert.

Mr. HAUGEN. To strike out lines 18 to 25, inclusive, and insert the language read.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RUBEY. This is the first time I have heard the amendment. I was not aware that the committee had agreed upon this proposition. It is very difficult to understand the amendment from the reading at the desk, and I ask the gentleman to pass this amendment over and let us have an opportunity to look at it.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be passed over, to be recurred to later.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this amendment will be passed over.

Mr. GARD. Is it the intention to allow the amendment to go back to the committee for clarification?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; we will pass it for the present, and recur to it later.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes, not on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman wait until the next section is read? Debate has been exhausted on the preceding section, and section 14 has been passed over.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 9 of this act shall not apply to any article of food delivered for shipment to any foreign country if in respect to the requirements of said section such article of food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in such foreign country and not in contravention of the laws of such country, but if said article of food be not actually exported this section shall not exempt such article of food from the operation of said sections.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MADDEN. I have an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has submitted a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman can object to it.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I move to strike out the last word. I will say to the gentleman that it is because my remarks are not germane to the section that I made the request for unanimous consent. I did not want it understood that I thought the remarks were germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MADDEN. I object for the time being, until I offer my amendment, which has the preference because it is an amendment to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MADDEN. I offer an amendment, on page 9, line 5, after the word "purchaser," to insert the words "or consignee."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 9, line 5, after the word "purchaser," insert the words "or consignee."

Mr. HAUGEN. I have no objection to the amendment. I accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I now renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, I trust the gentleman from Alabama will not press that request. There is great need for getting through with this bill. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HAUGEN] and myself are conferees with the Senate committee on the rent bill, which must be passed as soon as possible. It is very much to be regretted that it has not been passed before this. It ought to be passed, if possible, before the 1st of October, to-morrow, when a very large number of new leases will be made in this city. We have an engagement to meet the Senate conferees at 3 o'clock. We suggested that hour because we thought we could get through with this bill by that time, but we can not if we permit discussion on other matters. For that reason——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield before making his objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This morning we gave about 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] to discuss a certain matter of important foreign moment. This is the second time that the same gentleman has had unanimous consent to discuss that question. Nobody has been heard on this side beyond the five minutes that I got this morning, in which I got just to the middle of what I wanted to say. In the interest of fairness I ask the gentleman to give us on this side a certain amount of square deal. Will he not allow this beggarly five minutes that I ask? The gentleman himself took nearly five minutes in objecting to my request. It is certainly not in the interest of economy of time that the gentleman makes his objection. If it is to be put on the ground that he does not want matters of this kind discussed, why did the gentleman consent to his associate on that side discussing it?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I withdraw the objection, but give notice that I will renew it hereafter if similar requests are made.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 9, line 3, after the word "country," strike out the balance of the line and all of lines 4, 5, 6, and the word "country" in line 7.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have offered, if adopted, would strike out the following language now contained in the paragraph:

If in respect to the requirements of said section such article of food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in such foreign country and not in contravention of the laws of such country.

Now, I realize perfectly well that Congress has the same power to regulate foreign commerce as it has to regulate interstate commerce, but it occurs to me that this is rather a peculiar provision. It says to the Secretary of Agriculture that as to such foreign shipment, if it is agreed to by the purchaser and not in contravention to the laws of that country, then it is not subject to the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9. In other words, it puts upon the Secretary of Agriculture the duty and responsibility of enforcing the laws of a foreign country.

I recognize that it is perfectly proper for us to regulate the importations to this country of these food products under the same rules as apply to the sale of goods produced and manufactured and stored in this country, because if we did not do that, of course, we would not have a uniform rule. Section 16, which follows section 15, does do that very thing and gives authority to the Secretary of Agriculture whenever any goods are shipped into this country that do not comply with our storage regulations to hold them up, and the customshouse officials may refuse admission; and I think that is a perfectly proper authority. But I do think that as to exportations we ought to make a rule that the same regulations, that the same law shall apply to such shipments as apply to all the rest of the goods that enter into the cold-storage warehouses, or we ought to strike out this entire provision and put no restrictions on foreign shipments.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What part does the gentleman want to strike out?

Mr. BLACK. I want to strike out those words beginning with the word "country," line 3, and extending down to the word "country," on line 7. If stricken out the section as amended would read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 9 of this act shall not apply to any article of food delivered for shipment to any foreign country, but if said article of food be not actually exported this section shall not exempt such article of food from the operation of said sections.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How could that apply? It says not in contravention of the laws of that country. How could any regulation with reference to the treatment of food here be in contravention of the law of another country?

Mr. BLACK. It would not, of course, apply in such foreign country, but it would put on the Secretary of Agriculture the burden or duty of studying the laws of a foreign country, as to export shipments, because by the very provision in the language to which I call attention, the duty to deal with these foreign shipments is placed upon him.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. These laws could not be extraterritorial, and I do not see how they could be in contravention of any laws.

Mr. BLACK. No; but he could hold up the shipments. It gives him authority to do that if the exemptions from the different sections would be in contravention of the laws of the other country. We might have two or three or four different kinds of systems and put upon the Department of Agriculture the duty of studying out the different laws and finding out whether they are in contravention of the laws of the foreign country.

Mr. HAUGEN. That would not be necessary.

Mr. BLACK. I think it is sufficient for each country to regulate its own importations, and that is what we do in section 16.

Mr. HAUGEN. The goods are not to be marked if in respect to the requirement of said section such article of food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in such foreign country and not in contravention of the laws of such country.

If the specifications are there, the goods may be exported without marks if not in contravention with the laws of the country, otherwise they will have to be marked.

Mr. BLACK. Then that would put upon the Secretary of Agriculture the duty and responsibility of looking up each one of these cases when the purchaser of the export shipment has agreed that they may be exempted from regulations; he must look up the law of that foreign country and see whether that agreement is in contravention of the laws of that country. It is placing on him a duty of construing and interpreting the law of a foreign country. A rather difficult task, I should think, unless the Secretary had at hand the cold-storage laws of all foreign countries.

Mr. HAUGEN. This is in line with the law relating to the exportation of meats.

Mr. BLACK. We ought to exempt foreign shipments entirely or we ought to make the same law apply as applies to interstate-commerce shipments.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman would not want to export anything in contravention of the laws of the foreign country?

Mr. BLACK. That would be left to the foreign country itself. Of course, when the goods reach the ports of the foreign country it is subect to the control of their customshouse officials and the laws of such foreign countries. Each country certainly should be able to protect itself by its own laws.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman would not prevent the foreign shipments without marks. If it is not the purpose to export in contravention of law, why not state it in the bill. We state that we do not propose to permit exporting anything in contravention of laws of the foreign country.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Do the provisions of this act apply to the shipment of meat being made to a foreign country in refrigerator cars and then in a vessel under foreign jurisdiction, where it is put into cold storage for the first time?

Mr. HAUGEN. Except in that refrigerator vehicles and vessels are excepted in the definition of "warehouse." It applies as far as the 3-mile zone, after that 3-mile zone is passed it is out of this country's jurisdiction over interstate commerce and foreign commerce. Congress has no jurisdiction beyond that.

Mr. WALSH. Will it apply to a shipment of meat shipped in a refrigerator car where the meat is going to a foreign country when it is first put into cold storage?

Mr. HAUGEN. It will apply as far as the 3-mile zone, and that is as far as our jurisdiction extends.

Mr. WALSH. There is no 3-mile zone from Canada or Mexico.

Mr. HAUGEN. Our authority ceases when it crosses the line. If it is in a vessel sailing across the sea, then our jurisdiction ceases when it leaves the 3-mile zone.

Mr. WALSH. Well, now, suppose it is put in this refrigerator car and started for the boundary line? You say here this provision shall apply to articles of food delivered for shipment if said article of food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in such foreign countries and not in contravention of the laws of such country. Suppose——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the gentleman be given five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Now, assuming that the foreign country has not any laws at all upon the subject, that the Secretary of Agriculture knows that before the shipment is made, then in what situation will the shipper be with respect to a violation of this provision?

Mr. HAUGEN. He may mark the goods; that is all there would be to it.

Mr. WALSH. They have to conform to the law.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; he may conform to the law here in this country which requires that the goods must be marked. If he marks the goods, then this section does not prohibit his shipping them nor apply to the goods marked.

Mr. WALSH. And if they go beyond the line they can take off the tag and there is no liability?

Mr. HAUGEN. We can not object to that, because we have no jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. I see. I just wanted to get that clear from the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 2, strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I take it for granted, speaking to the chairman of the committee, that that is a clerical error, is it not?

Mr. HAUGEN. A violation of all the sections, of a single one.

Mr. RAKER. How can you tell which section he violates? It means nothing the way it is here—"that the provisions of section 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 9."

Mr. HAUGEN. Either of them; any of them.

Mr. RAKER. But it does not say that.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the usual language.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. May we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the amendment of the gentleman from California were adopted it would be necessary to show a violation of all the sections. As it reads with the word "or," if there is a violation of any one there can be a prosecution. The amendment certainly ought not to be adopted.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman is mistaken, I think. If you will read carefully, the section reads, "that the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 9 of this act shall not apply to any article of food under certain conditions. Now, if it read that all of the sections shall not apply under certain conditions, that is in the alternative, and it ought to be conjunctive, and I think the membership should read this carefully, and they will find that the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. RAKER. The text of the section shows clearly that is what the committee intended, because the last proviso says, "but if said article of food be not actually exported this section shall not exempt such article of food from the operation of said section." What section? Sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9. That is what the committee wanted, and I want to help them along, so as to make it absolutely plain. That is all.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I must confess to a very careless reading of this section. I thought it provided for some penalty, but it does not, and I am inclined to think the gentleman from California is right.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROMJUE. I would suggest the necessity of adding an "s" to the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan, in line 4, the word "section" ought to be "sections." I move to strike out the word "section" and insert the word "sections."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Strictly speaking, the gentleman is right about it, but there is a definition that says the singular or plural shall be used where the case demands it. I think probably it might be added.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I make the motion to strike out the word "section" and insert the word "sections."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Let the gentleman make his motion to add the letter "s"; there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 4, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "sections."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the words in lines 3 and 4 "in respect to the requirements of said section" ought to be stricken from the bill, so that the section would read "for shipment to any foreign country if such article of food complies," and so forth. The words "in respect to the requirements of said section" are mere surplusage. The purpose of this section is to eliminate with respect to foreign consignments, the requirements of the sections cited. This being so and foreign consignments being placed on a different basis from consignments within the United States, the words "in respect to the requirements of said sections," have really no meaning in this connection. Provided the goods conform to the requirements of the foreign consignee, and are not in contravention of the laws of the place of the consignment, the requirements of the sections cited may be utterly disregarded with respect to such shipments.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I move to strike out the words "in respect to the requirements of said section."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: On page 9, line 3, after the word "if," strike out the words "in respect to the requirements of said section."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. I fear if the gentleman's amendment is adopted it would do away with the marking entirely. All that would be necessary then would be to allege that it was for export and it would not require any marking at all. The section has reference to the marking of goods.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The moment you say the provisions of the said sections shall not apply, under the conditions cited you thereby eliminate the requirements of the sections with respect to goods that are intended for foreign purchasers.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that the phrase which the gentleman seeks to strike out is a limitation upon what the article of food must comply with. In other words, this is the language:

If, in respect to the requirements of said section, such article of food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser.

It does not have to comply with all the specifications and directions of the purchaser, but it does in respect to these particular requirements, and also if it is not in contravention with the laws in respect to these particular requirements.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This section states that the goods shall conform to the instructions of the foreign purchaser, and shall not be marked conformably to the provisions of the law controlling domestic operations, thereby excluding all provisions of this act from applying to goods consigned on foreign account. The plain intent of the section is that it will be sufficient for the purposes of shipment abroad that the goods shall conform to the foreigner's instructions, and shall not be in contravention of the foreign laws. This being so, it seems to me that the words "in respect to the requirements of said sections," are entirely superfluous. As well use in this connection the word "provisions." The requirements of said sections are contained in the provisions of said section. To retain these words is mere tautology.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the words were stricken out, and a party were to allege that a lot of eggs were for export, there would be no marking required, because sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 require the marking. You say it shall not apply to export. Anybody that alleges that an article is for export will not be required to mark it. And if they are in cold storage for export, there is no way of checking them.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This section states precisely that if these articles of food shall comply with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in a foreign country, the requirements of our domestic law shall not apply to such articles. The use of these words is merely to refer again to provisions intended for domestic business, and expressly excluded as to foreign consignments under the conditions cited.

Mr. HAUGEN. It will do no harm, anyway, to leave it in.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proposed amendment. If the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] should be adopted the section would read as follows:

That the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, or 9 of this act shall not apply to any article of food delivered for shipment to any foreign country, if such article of food complies with the specifications and directions of the purchaser in such foreign country.

That is the exception. In other words, in order to exempt it the article of food must not only comply with the specifications required in that section, but the article of food must comply with the specifications and directions of the purchaser. The purchaser might make directions and specifications entirely out of line with these sections, but might make the same requirements in these sections and many additional, and not in contravention of the law of the country. Now, the phrase sought to be stricken out modifies that. In other words, it is required to be in conformity with the law of said country in respect to the requirements of this particular section. I think the purpose of the section would be much clearer if the language were left as it now appears.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Take the case of goods that have been delivered for foreign shipment, and which in all respects comply with the specifications and directions of the foreign purchaser and are not in contravention of the laws of the purchaser's country. In such a case would the sections cited apply to the shipment?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If that be true, what meaning may be found in the words "in respect to the requirements of said section"? You admit that the moment the goods comply with the requirements of the foreign purchaser, that this conformity will eliminate the application of the sections cited to such goods.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Why should the food be required to comply with all the specifications and directions of the purchaser in a foreign country?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is a sine qua non. That is the very condition precedent under which it is provided that the sections cited shall not apply.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is where your construction and my construction differ. I think it is only, as drawn, that they shall comply as to the requirements of this particular section, and I think it is only required that they shall comply with foreign law in respect to these matters. If the gentleman's contention is right, it must comply with all the requirements of the foreign law and all the directions and specifications of the purchaser.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The goods do not have to comply with the requirements of the foreign laws. It is merely required that they shall not be in contravention of those laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARD. For the purpose of offering an amendment, on page 9, line 6, after the word "and," and before the word "not," to insert the word "be."

I do this for the purpose of making clear the expression.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 9, line 6, after the word "and" insert the word "be."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to be heard on it. It is manifestly a proper correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. (a) That whenever in the case of any article of food being offered for importation the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that such article of food is being shipped in commerce in violation of any provision of this act, he shall give due notice and opportunity for hearing thereon to the owner or consignee, and certify such fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon (1) refuse admission and delivery to the consignee of such article of food, or (2) deliver such article of food to the consignee pending examination, hearing, and decision in the matter on the execution of a penal bond to the amount of the full invoice value of such article of food, together with the duty thereon, if any, and to the effect that on refusal to return such article of food for any cause to the Secretary of the Treasury when demanded, for the purpose of excluding it from the country or for any other purpose, the consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond.

(b) If, after proceeding in accordance with subdivision (a) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture is satisfied that such article of food being offered for importation was shipped in commerce in violation of any provision of this act, he shall certify the fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon notify the owner or consignee and cause the sale or other disposition of such article of food refused admission and delivery or entered under bond, unless it is exported by the owner or consignee within three months from the date of such notice, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. All charges for storage, cartage, or labor on any such article of food which is refused admission or delivery or is entered upon bond shall be paid by the owner or consignee.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. On line 9, page 10, it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may cause this property to be sold. Is that the usual procedure?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the usual procedure.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, he can take possession of the property and sell it and turn over the proceeds and assess the cost to the consignee. Now, one other question. On lines 13 and 14 we find "all charges for storage, cartage, or labor." Is there any reason why those charges should be confined to those particular items, or ought it to be "all charges"?

Mr. HAUGEN. I believe that is all of them.

Mr. RAKER. Are there any legal charges, expenses of inspection, and things of that sort?

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not think they make any charges for that.

Mr. RAKER. None whatever?

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

Mr. RAKER. All the expenses that the Government may go to in making the examination if the party has imported it in contravention of this statute and it is authorized to be sold?

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand in that case those charges are not taxed up. That is my understanding of it. I am not clear about it.

Mr. RAKER. Maybe the gentleman from Minnesota is familiar with it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The cost of the sale would follow, as a matter of course, under the general law. These charges here have to be specified; otherwise they would not follow.

Mr. RAKER. I see.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That whenever it appears that any article of food in transportation in a refrigerator vehicle in commerce or in cold storage in the District of Columbia or a Territory is in such condition that it is likely immediately to become or is unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for food, the Secretary of Agriculture may cause the immediate seizure of such article of food and thereupon shall at once cause notice of the facts to be given to the United States district attorney for the district in which the article of food is seized. Such district attorney shall proceed without delay against such article of food in any court of the United States in such district for confiscation by process of libel for condemnation. If in the opinion of the court the article of food is in such condition that it is likely immediately to become or is unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for food it shall be immediately disposed of by destruction or sale as the court shall direct, but such disposition shall not be contrary to any law of the United States or of the State, Territory, or District where such destruction or sale takes place. The proceeds of any sale under this section, less legal costs and charges, shall be paid to the person entitled thereto. The proceedings in such seizure cases shall conform as nearly as may be to proceedings in admiralty and shall be at the suit and in the name of the United States. For the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture may cause investigations, inspections, analyses, and tests to be made and samples to be collected of any article of food in commerce. The Department of Agriculture shall pay to the person entitled, upon his request, the reasonable market value of any such samples.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARBOUR. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman or some member of the committee a question. Is it the intention of this language, commencing on line 3, page 12, and ending with the word "agent," on line 9, page 12, that after affidavits are taken in this manner they may be used as evidence in court?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will turn it over to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No. It is not the intention to change the rules of evidence.

Mr. BARBOUR. I did not think it was.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not think it would be construed as such. The same question arose in my own mind when this draft was first submitted to us, and I objected to these words and myself drew others. But I came to the conclusion that this can not be construed as an attempt to change the rules of evidence, and that an affidavit taken outside, however made, could not be used, except perhaps in connection with and as part of a deposition taken, as the gentleman is familiar, if it were offered.

Mr. BARBOUR. I believe that that was the intention of the language, but I confess that after a careful reading I was somewhat in doubt as to the effect of the words "have like force and effect as if administered or taken by or before the clerk of such court."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It means as if the identical paper had been sworn to before the clerk. That would not permit that matter to be read as evidence or testimony in the case, would it, in any case?

Mr. BARBOUR. Not that I know of, but my understanding of this language is that possibly it might have that effect. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman is right in saying that the paper, if sworn to before the clerk himself, could not be offered in lieu of testimony of witnesses.

Mr. BARBOUR. The reason I asked the question is that the meaning of the language is more or less doubtful to me, and it occurred to me that possibly an amendment making the meaning a little clearer would be in order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The Federal courts have held that an affidavit made before a notary public can not be used for certain purposes or made the basis of some certain action by the Attorney General. The intention is that an affidavit sworn to before an officer of the department justifying such action by the Attorney General shall have the same force and effect as similar papers made and executed before a clerk of the court. That was the intention of the committee.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am willing to accept the committee's construction, but the language of the bill is a little confusing to me.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was confused by it myself at first, but after examination and reading the cases in the books which the legal representative of the Department of Agriculture brought to me I was satisfied that the language is safe and proper.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to designate in writing specifically officers, employees, and agents of the Department of Agriculture to administer oaths for the purposes of this act. All such officers, employees, and agents are authorized and empowered to administer to or take from any person an oath, affirmation, or affidavit for the purposes of this act, or for use in prosecution or proceeding thereunder. Any such oath, affirmation, or affidavit, authenticated by the official seal of the Department of Agriculture, shall, when offered for use in any court of the United States, have like force and effect as if administered or taken by or before the clerk of such court, without further proof of the identity or authority of such officer, employee, or agent. No such officer, employee, or agent shall demand or accept any fee or compensation whatsoever for administering or taking any oath, affirmation, or affidavit under the authority conferred by this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 12, line 6, after the word "court," strike out the words "of the United States."

Mr. RAKER. As the statute now stands, these affidavits can not be used in any State court.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Why should they be, and how under any circumstances under this act can suit be brought except in the United States court?

Mr. RAKER. I know of many instances in which these affidavits could be used in the State courts. I call the gentleman's attention specifically to the fact that they might be used in the first cases that are commenced. A man violates the provisions of this act, and it is a felony. He can be bound over by a magistrate in a State court to await proceedings before a grand jury. That being the case, these affidavits could not be used.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the distinguished lawyer representing California ever seen a justice of the peace or foreman of a grand jury yet who would not admit any kind of testimony that bore even remotely upon the case?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have never seen any. They admit everything.

Mr. RAKER. I have seen brainy men who were justices of the peace, and they have gone on up to the supreme court of their State, and some of them have even come to Congress from other States than California. There are many brainy, brilliant men on the grand jury, and the gentleman's suggestion does not apply. It does not go before the local grand jury; but a man who violates this statute, as in the case of a violation of any other Federal statute, can be proceeded against in the State courts before a magistrate for the purpose of binding him over to the Federal grand jury. Now, all I want to do is to make this section applicable, so when you go before the magistrate's court the testimony will be admissible and usable before that court, so that the man may be legitimately bound over. There is no reason why you should confine it and say it is admissible only in the United States courts, when it ought to be admissible in any court because other rights might grow out of it. Section 1014, United States Revised Statutes, provides the remedy to follow. The following letter from the Attorney General of the United States fully explains what can be done in such cases under section 1014 supra. The letter reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., June 11, 1918.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: This department has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of June 5, 1918, respecting the arrest and preliminary examination by State and county magistrates of persons accused of crimes against the sabotage and espionage laws.

Section 1014 of the United States Revised Statutes provides, in part, as follows:

"For any crime or offense against the United States the offender may, by any justice, or judge of the United States, or by any commissioner of a circuit court to take bail, or by any chancellor, judge of a supreme or superior court, chief or first judge of common pleas, mayor of a city, justice of the peace, or other magistrate, of any State where he may be found, and agreeable to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State, and at the expense of the United States, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by law has cognizance of the offense."

Under the foregoing provision of section 1014 of the Revised Statutes there would seem to be no doubt of the power of the State or county peace officers to arrest persons committing Federal crimes according to the practice of the State wherein the offender is apprehended and of the judicial officers described in the statute to hold such persons to answer for the crime of which they are accused for the proper Federal court.

Respectfully,

JOHN LORD O'BRIAN,
Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what it means for me to differ with the distinguished gentleman from California on a legal proposition; but if a justice of the peace has authority to bind a man over to the Federal grand jury I know nothing of any State law or procedure that will permit it.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. While district attorney I appeared in proceedings where at least half a dozen men were bound over to the Federal court before the committing magistrate of my county, and those men were afterwards indicted and tried and convicted, and the law is to-day that a magistrate in a State can hear the case for the purpose of binding the man over to await the action of the Federal grand jury.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is that a Federal statute?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; a Federal statute.

Mr. IGOE. He can admit him to bail.

Mr. RAKER. Certainly, he can take bail, and order him to appear, and so forth, under section 1014, United States Revised Statutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. This was framed with the idea that these matters are entirely in charge of Federal officials, and that actions will be brought in the Federal courts; and, in my judgment, if a man is charged with violating this statute the first proceeding will be before a United States commissioner and not before a justice of the peace.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is it not the procedure of which the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] erroneously spoke—and I use the word "erroneously" with the utmost respect—that you can not bind a man over from a justice of the peace in a State to a Federal grand jury, but you can require him to give bond to appear before a United States commissioner? There is no binding over to the Federal grand jury by a justice of the peace.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Perhaps I am not entirely familiar with the proceeding, but I feel confident that there is no binding over to a Federal grand jury by a magistrate acting under State law. I believe the section should stand as it is.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There was one thing that occurred to me, and that is whether a United States commissioner would be a court within the meaning of this section. Of course, when a United States commissioner hears these cases he hears them upon evidence, but it is my recollection that the Supreme Court has held that a commissioner is not a court.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I should like to suggest an amendment which it seems to me would cure the objection of everybody. That is, to strike out the words, in line 6, "any court of the United States" and insert "any proceeding under this act," so that it will read:

Shall, when offered for use in any proceeding under this act, have like force and effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as a substitute?

Mr. ANDERSON. I offer that as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from California if I may have the floor for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. RAKER: In line 6, on page 12, strike out the words "any court of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the words "any proceeding under this act."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Why not insert those words in addition?

Mr. ANDERSON. Acting upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, I ask to modify my amendment so as to leave in the bill the words "any court of the United States" and insert prior to that "any proceeding under this act or in."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, what does the amendment suggested by the gentleman add to the amendment? Are not the United States courts included, without adding those words? When the amendment provides for use in any proceeding it also includes any court proceeding.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, why should those words be added?

Mr. ANDERSON. I did that in deference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], who wanted to make it doubly sure. I do not see any harm in doing it in that way.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It is suggested that there are proceedings before a United States commissioner, and that a United States commissioner's tribuial is not a court.

Mr. DOWELL. That is the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, to include the commissioner.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. But in his amendment he puts all proceedings, which includes the commissioner as well as the court. I can see no reason why you should add language that is absolute surplusage.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota to modify his amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 12, line 6, before the word "any," insert "any proceeding under this act or in."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That, for the enforcement of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture:

(1) Is authorized to prescribe and promulgate such regulations as may be necessary;

(2) May cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or any person; and

(3) Shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, not in conflict with existing law, and make such expenditure for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, traveling expenses, and other supplies and expenses as shall be necessary to the administration of this act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere. All employees shall be appointed in accordance with the civil-service laws and regulations.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to page 13 to strike out all after the word "elsewhere" in line 3, and lines 4 and 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 3, after the word "elsewhere" strike out the balance of the line and lines 4 and 5.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I think these words got in there in an involuntary way. I called the attention of the committee to the language and tried to induce them to strike it out, and so I am going to move on the floor of the House to strike it out. The words are as follows:

All employees shall be appointed in accordance with the civil-service laws and regulations.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the usual provision.

Mr. RUBEY. It occurred to me that by the optimistic way in which that side of the House is proceeding, they might want to get rid of this provision later.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to discuss this question.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Everybody knows the arguments on both sides.

Mr. ELSTON. Yes; this matter has been discussed in Congress for 50 years, and I do not think the employees should be open to the spoils system.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY) there were 7 ayes and 21 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 16, after the word "necessary" insert "provided that there shall be no punishment by imprisonment for the violation of any such regulations."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it will be noticed in section 19 there is this general provision, which is very sweeping:

That for the enforcement of this act the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to prescribe and promulgate such regulations as may be necessary.

This is a general authorization to the Secretary of Agriculture to prescribe regulations, and a roving commission to him to cover any territory he wants to. The theory is that notwithstanding the provision concerning regulations in section 13 is limited to specific sections, and only provides for punishment for violation of regulations under sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 18, this is probably an authorization for additional regulations under these sections. I think it ought to be made clear that it is not the purpose of this House to undertake to delegate its powers to enact criminal laws to any department. I realize that the department must have the right to issue regulations, but I do not think we ought to put it in the power of any department to issue a regulation which does not become a part of the public law and is merely, perhaps, promulgated in such a way as not to reach all the people, and then punish by imprisonment anyone violating the regulation.

I think we ought not to put it in the power of a Cabinet officer to issue regulations and then provide that any American citizen who violates such regulations shall be put in the penitentiary.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I can not quite follow the gentleman's logic. He is willing to fine him but is not willing to imprison him. Why should you punish a man at all for violating regulations?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman from Texas will offer an amendment that no punishment shall be inflicted for the violations of the regulations I will support it. The reason I offered it in this form was that I hoped the committee would adopt the amendment. I was afraid that if I offered it in the shape that no punishment should be inflicted for a violation of the regulations they would be afraid that the regulations would not be enforced.

Mr. ANDERSON. And if the gentleman will permit, he would have some reason to suppose that the regulations would not be complied with?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not at all; we have regulations in the departments all the time that are being complied with. This is an unusual procedure, and until a few years ago it was of doubtful validity to delegate the power to somebody else outside of the Congress of the United States to really pass legislation which is of a criminal nature providing punishment for crime. It is an old rule of criminal law, well recognized in the decisions of United States courts, that the law must be definite and certain, so that every one may know beforehand when he is violating the provisions. Now, we do not write the provisions in here, the violation of which shall be punished, but we grant the department head the right by printed regulations to enact legislation the violation of which will lead to punishment.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana will agree with me in saying that all criminal statutes must be strictly construed?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Starting with that as a basis, is it not true that whatever regulations the Secretary might make, unless such regulation or violation thereof was an infraction of the provisions of this statute and punishable by fine or imprisonment under this statute, there could be no fine or imprisonment whatever for a violation of the regulations?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not at all agree with the gentleman's construction which he has just announced. It has been held that the law may have certain provisions, the violation of those provisions may be a criminal offense under the terms of the act, and the same act may grant authority to make regulations concerning the same subject matter and make a violation of the regulations a crime just the same as the terms of the provision; and that is what this amounts to.

Mr. DEWALT. Where in the act does it say any regulation that is made by the Secretary of the Treasury a violation of which shall be punished by fine or imprisonment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask for two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEWALT. That is what that provides, only as to the particular section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it might be a very reasonable construction, that because there are no regulations provided in this section, the power to enact regulations covers the scope of all the sections enumerated in section 13.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. If the amendment of the gentleman should prevail, then there is a regulation made under the power given under section 13. Could a violation of that regulation be enforced if the amendment prevails?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It would subject the person who violates the regulations to a fine.

Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania. But no imprisonment?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But no imprisonment. I think it is a dangerous thing, gentlemen, for Members of this Congress to let some Cabinet member prescribe regulations, when it is out of our power to control the regulations, and provide that a man may be sent to the penitentiary for a violation of a regulation that is not yet in existence.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ROSE. I just rose to say I thoroughly agree with the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]. Now, in taking up section 19 does the gentleman contend that the Secretary of Agriculture can make any rules or regulations contrary to the acts of Congress upon this subject?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. ROSE. Is not the gentleman from Pennsylvania precisely right in what he says that we need to have no fear about this first clause of section 19?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. He can not make anything contrary to the provisions of the section, but he can make regulations additional to deal with every subject of legislation under this act, and he can make all sorts of regulations.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GARD. I gather from what the gentleman said that doubtless his purpose is good. But I can not follow the logic of the gentleman's argument that a man may be subject to a fine but not subject to imprisonment. There can be no such differentiation in punishment, in my opinion. I desire to call attention to what I think may remedy the situation. In section 13, line 8, it provides that regulations prescribed thereunder refer to certain sections. Now, there is no regulation, as the gentleman has well said; no statutory regulation prescribed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARD. I ask that the gentleman be given three additional minutes for the purpose of answering my question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. My suggestion is, after the words "any regulations prescribed thereunder," to insert the words "by the Secretary of Agriculture," which would then, in my opinion, carry out the meaning of the section and the regulations under the section, and also what I would deem to be the law as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I did not quite catch the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. GARD. Under section 13 I call attention that there are no regulations prescribed thereunder. As a matter of fact, there are none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Unless prescribed——

Mr. GARD. Unless prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Why not put that in section 13?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We can not return to section 13 except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARD. It can be done by action of the committee for the purpose of correcting section 13 and clarify the situation.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the regulations are prescribed by the Secretary to carry out section 13, they are prescribed under section 13.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman: Does the gentleman claim that a violation of regulations under this section 19 subjects the person who has violated them to punishment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Fine and imprisonment?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Fine and imprisonment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And gives general leeway to the Secretary of Agriculture to make regulations dealing with all this cold-storage subject?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Every regulation must be entirely in keeping with the section under which it is made.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It must be in keeping with it. That is, it must not be in contravention of the terms of the act. There is nothing to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from making additional regulations for the violation of any section that might penalize a person for a violation of something that was intended to be made directory only, and a violation of that is here made the subject of penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think this certainly ought to be adopted.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to belabor this argument, but it seems to me that a brief explanation of the position taken by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] will show both its fallacy and inexpediency. Reading section 13 it provides:

> That any person who violates any provision of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, or 18 of this act, or any regulations prescribed thereunder, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

Regulations prescribed under what? Under the particular sections.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But there are no regulations under those sections.

Mr. DEWALT. I will get to that.

Now, for the enforcement of these particular sections thus enumerated there are contemplated regulations, and those regulations are to be made by the Secretary of Agriculture. Now, when those regulations are thus made by the provisions of this very act, they become a portion of the act itself in contemplation, and the act provides a penalty of what? A penalty not exceeding $1,000 fine or imprisonment of not more than one year, or both, leaving it entirely in the discretion of the court as to how little or how much that punishment shall be. Now, if these regulations are necessary for the enforcement of these specific provisions, of course anybody who disobeys them ought to be punished. Provisions 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and so forth, would, in fact, be nugatory. Is not that so?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think so.

Mr. DEWALT. How would you enforce them unless there were regulations to enforce them?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The act specifies certain things to be done, and says it shall be unlawful if they shall not be done. The section that provides the penalty says that the failure to do those things shall subject one to a penalty.

Mr. DEWALT. Very well. The fear of the gentleman is this, that the Secretary of Agriculture by his regulatory process would designate something in the way of regulation, compelling the Government or the authorities to punish a man for something which would not be punishable? Is not that so?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; and the additional fear that the Secretary might make some regulations which we as Congress would not make, and penalize a person for violating; and yet we give him carte blanche to do it here.

Mr. DEWALT. But the gentleman must remember that every regulation that is made by the Secretary of Agriculture must be consistent with the purposes and tenor of this act.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But, of course, they will be additional to the specific provisions of this act.

Mr. DEWALT. I grant you that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We may deal with the little details and make some little requirements which we would not think the violation of should be punished.

Mr. DEWALT. I think the fear is far-fetched.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The fear I have is that we are going to establish a precedent, and I think this is a very vicious one. We are going to establish the precedent of delegating to somebody else the power to say when citizens of the United States shall be punished by imprisonment.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will come back to the basic idea that every criminal statute must be strictly construed, and, secondly, any such construction must be in favor of the defendant, then he will come to the other proposition, that no regulation can be made by the Secretary of Agriculture that is inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SIEGEL: Page 13, line 5, after the word "regulations," strike out the period and insert "but preference shall be given to those who served in the Army or Navy during the late war."

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that amendment requires any discussion. It simply provides that those who served in the late war——

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he would accept an amendment to include the marines?

Mr. SIEGEL. The marine service is a part of the Navy.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a quasi naval service, both Army and Navy.

Mr. SIEGEL. The amendment reads "Army or Navy," and the Navy includes the marines.

Mr. BLANTON. It can be construed as a separate branch of the service, too, and to be sure we include them I offer an amendment to add after the word "Navy" the words "and marine service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SIEGEL. If the gentleman uses the words "marine service," it will also include the United States Treasury service, and we do not want that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON to the amendment offered by Mr. SIEGEL: After the word "Navy" insert the words "or marines."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute in the following language:

Strike out the period after the word "regulations" on line 5, page 13, and continue, "but preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a substitute for the original amendment?

Mr. GARD. It is a substitute for the Siegel amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 5, after the word "regulations," strike out the period and insert a comma and add "but preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] yield to a question?

Mr. BLANTON. The Gard substitute covers it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not a fact that there is already in the permanent law of the United States a provision giving preference to soldiers, sailors, and marines?

Mr. GARD. No. There is no such law as that, as I understand it.

Mr. ROGERS. My information is very clear that as a rider on an appropriation bill—I think the urgent deficiency appropriation bill—we established a direct preference for soldiers, sailors, and marines, not only of the late war but also those who served at any time in the service of the United States in any war.

Mr. GARD. That is the object of my substitute. It carries out the purpose of giving preference to all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who have seen service in the Army or Navy of the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. I see no objection to enacting it all over again, but it is already in the law, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, for administering the provisions of this act.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do so for the purpose of asking to have some resolutions read which were adopted by the American Legion Post, of Mansfield, Ohio, protesting against bonuses and pensions for soldiers of the Great War, and my reply thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the resolutions indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman propose to have them read?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I think the House would be glad to have them read.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I object to their being read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to their being inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage, but no penalty, fine, forfeiture, or imprisonment shall be enforced for any violation occurring within 90 days after its passage.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I do so to ask the members of the committee when this act would take effect if this language were not used, "That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage"? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the only necessary language in this section is, "No penalty, fine, forfeiture, or imprisonment shall be enforced for any violation occurring within 90 days after its passage." I would like to ask if there is any provision in any of the sections of the bill that would take effect at a period of time other than as stated in section 21?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. WALSH. Then I wondered why that language is used in the first part of the section, because all acts take effect from and after their approval.

Mr. HAUGEN. We wanted to limit that.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman seeks to have this act take effect from and after its passage, and not after its approval. Now, all acts take effect when they are approved. If you want to safeguard it in the interest of the people subject to the provisions of the act, so that they will not be proceeded against within 90 days after its passage, all right.

Mr. HAUGEN. There are acts that are not approved. They become a law after 10 days.

Mr. WALSH. Then the approval is by Congress by a two-thirds vote over the objections of the Executive. That has been construed many times.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is immaterial whether you use the word "passage" or "approval."

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose not to discuss this section or any particular section of this bill. Judging from the different viewpoints from which Members have considered this bill, or have understood it, considering the interpretations of it, it seems to me it is somewhat like the case referred to by the psalmist when he says, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made."

The profiteer is undoubtedly entitled to all the denunciation that an outraged and long-suffering public is directing against him. I can not say "God bless the profiteer" that sells a pair of shoes for $18 for which he paid the wholesaler $8, nor yet the profiteer that sells a bushel of potatoes for $3.60 for which the producer received $1.25, nor yet the retail butcher that sells a carcass cut up within 50 steps of the cold-storage room of the packer wholesaler for 80 to 100 per cent more than he paid that same packer. No; I can not say, "God bless him," as did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], and not being a profane man I am precluded from saying what I think. [Laughter.]

I will say that it is my candid opinion that if any system of distribution covering the movement of the commodity from the wholesaler to the consumer as efficient as that covering the movement from the producer to the wholesaler could be devised, it would result in cheapening the commodity to the consumer at least 10 per cent, and doubtless in many instances 20 or 30 per cent.

No one believes there is any efficiency or justice where the consumer pays the retailer a profit of 80 to 100 and in some cases 250 per cent advance over cost. And I will go further and say if such an efficient system of distribution as that to which I have referred could be devised and put into successful operation it could not be done without a well-organized system in which the overhead charges would be reduced to a minimum. It would be especially successful in the large cities. What then? Why, this: At once the cry would be that the great system had put the small dealer out of business, as it inevitably would do. Then at once this system would be assailed and denounced as a monopoly; a congressional investigation would be ordered; restrictive legislation would be enacted.

What has given the packer the monopoly that he now possesses? I answer, there are a number of reasons; and not for a moment denying that he has been guilty of culpable methods, of questionable practices, there yet remains the fact that the true answer is efficiency.

Why can not the Washington butcher compete with the packer? I do not believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS], while I admit the pertinence of his remarks, has given us the correct answer to the question. I undertake to say that the Washington butcher can not under existing conditions compete with the packer. In the first place, the live cattle are not contiguous to Washington. He is not equipped to slaughter them. Each butcher can not maintain a slaughter-house to kill the cattle he requires for his trade.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I saw a statement of Swift & Co., published in one of the papers last week, giving the prices of meat delivered to the retailers here in Washington. One day it was 17 cents a pound.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. It was $17.05 a hundred.

Mr. KEARNS. On that same day at any of the distributing places or retail houses the cheapest part of that meat was 40 cents a pound and the highest price was 75 cents a pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I am glad the gentleman from Ohio called that matter to my attention.

Mr. KEARNS. How does the gentleman explain the fact that the retailers here bought that meat at 17 cents a pound and the cheapest of it was sold to the consumer at 40 cents and the highest at 75 cents?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. That is an average of 300 per cent for overhead charge.

Mr. KEARNS. The profiteers there were not Swift & Co. It was the Washington retailer of meats.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. That is what I am telling this committee as I proceed.

There are 750 shops or stores that sell meats in Washington. There is only one way that the meat purveyors or retailers of this Capital City can be exempt from the necessity of patronizing the Chicago packer, and that is to erect a packing house here at Washington. And it could be that the new monopoly would be worse than the old.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the distinguished gentleman from Kansas know that there is just one solution for this question, and that is for Congress to fix the maximum profit that any retailer can make on any given stuff sold in his establishment? Whenever we do that, then we have taken some step along the right line, and until we do that we are wasting our time and the people's time.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. The gentleman from Texas may be right, but he could perform a greater service to the American people if he could carefully suggest the modus operandi by which that could be accomplished.

Mr. BLANTON. I have just suggested it, that we should pass a law to that effect.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. That is some suggestion, and I will come to it if I have the time.

Efficiency has been the word in cheapening production. Make efficiency the word in distribution, and you will in a great measure have solved the problem of the high cost of living.

Now, the gentleman from Texas will note that I am discussing the subject so near to his heart. What kind of a howl would go up if the packers should set up a dozen shops in town, and announce that to-morrow morning they would begin the sale of all meats at a rate of 4 cents per pound above the wholesale price? Every one of 750 retailers of the city would be up in arms against the new innovation. The local butcher can not compete with the packer for another important reason and that is that the packer utilizes and gets much profit from many by-products, from which the local butcher gets nothing. This is a most interesting chapter, gentlemen, and I have not the time to take it up. But I do not love the packer.

What shall I say, that I hate him with perfect hatred and I count him as mine enemy. And why not hate him? Let us not do that thing that may bring evil upon ourselves. I certainly would not destroy his business, but would restrain him from exploiting the public.

When the packer sells, as he has sold, at the prices which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] suggested, his responsibility ceases. The people of this city might organize like the labor unions do, and demand collective bargaining; there is no law that forbids it. It would be a commendable thing to do, a consumation devoutly to be wished. It would give the consumer much cheaper meat, and the 400 or 500 retailers whose occupation would be gone could go out and pick apples and chop wood. But I said, lest we bring evil upon ourselves; speaking for the live-stock growers, of whom I am one, and ultimately of the consumer who is the object of my collateral affection, the packer is the only market for millions of cattle; not always a good market, but always a market. It is important to the producer of cattle and swine that he shall have a stable market. I rather like that word, stability—stabilization. At the beginning of the war we were admonished to raise cattle, and we responded and raised cattle; and when the war suddenly collapsed, just one year sooner than almost anyone expected, we were told that the decimation of the European herds as a consequence of the war would hold up the price of cattle for at least two or three years to come. Well, you know the farmer is a sort of a confiding kind of man. He did not worry; but along about the 1st day of June of the present year the price of cattle on the markets began to drop, and then the live-stock producer began to worry; and the decline continued until last Monday morning, when the producer sat down and figured that on the 69,000,000 of live cattle that he owned he had suffered a loss in value of $1,500,000,000. I repeat, $1,500,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the committee let me have five minutes more in which to conclude my remarks?

Mr. RUBEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. As a result of the drop in the market some two weeks ago, when hogs dropped in one day $5 a hundred pounds, and cattle have dropped in proportion, does the gentleman think that the consuming public are getting or will get any benefit of that drop?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. That question will be answered in the course of my remarks, if the gentleman is willing to wait for the answer which I have prepared. I am dwelling upon this question rather analytically, and I appreciate the attention of the committee. Twenty-five cattle owners from Kansas came on here last week, representing the ownership of about 400,000 cattle, on which the loss per head is $40 below the actual cost of production, or $16,000,000 in the aggregate.

That is the statement of those gentlemen who came here to appear before the Agricultural Committees of the Senate and House—$16.000.000 in the aggregate.

Now, the President's recommendation that we reduce the high cost of living and the statement of Mr. Hoover that there was large overproduction, and the country's confident expectation that the packers would be prosecuted, all seemed to fall with deadly effect upon the western cattlemen's stock in trade. And most pathetic, most sad to contemplate, if all reports are true, answering the gentleman's interrogation, the poor consumers reap little if any relief. I will pause here, gentlemen, to state that a résumé of the wholesale prices of dressed beef in this town, down here in the cooling rooms of the packers, shows a decline of approximately 7 cents per pound during the last five months, and should result in an approximate reduction, even on the basis of the high prices which the retailers have been charging, of from 12 to 15 cents per pound in the price of meat to the consumer.

Mr. RICKETTS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the drop in the prices charged by the packers had come within the last week or 10 days?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. No; the drop has been made in a period covering possibly 90 days. I have not the exact date.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does not the gentleman know that since we began consideration of the question of controlling cold storage, and since it has been discussed by Members generally for the last two or three months, the packers have gradually reduced, but prior to that time they had made no pretension of reducing? Now, can the gentleman explain why right now the packers have millions of pounds of all kinds of meat on hand that have been stored in their storehouses for the past two years, when the people all over this country are practically starving for a sufficient amount of meat to eat? Why do they not release that meat, if they want to be fair, and put it on the market?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I will answer the gentleman as best I can. In the first place, I do not admit the gentleman's statement. I think he is misinformed.

Mr. RICKETTS. If the gentleman will pardon me, the gentleman would be willing to take the statistics of the Bureau of Markets, would he not?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. The statistics of the Bureau of Markets ought to be authentic.

Mr. RICKETTS. Those figures are my authority.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. But a member of the Committee on Agriculture made the statement here which was unchallenged, I think possibly during the course of the remarks of the gentleman, that there was not in cold storage to-day a sufficient amount of beef to supply the demand of this country for more than six or seven days.

I want to state further in that regard that ex-Gov. Stubbs, of Kansas, made a statement either before the Secretary of Agriculture or before the committee, or both, that the packers had stated that they were not putting meats in cold storage. I do not admit the contention stated by the gentleman from Ohio, and with all kindness I think he is in error.

This condition can only have one present result, and that is to discourage the cattle industry. In proof that this result is now in process of operation, Gov. Stubbs stated when here a few days ago that four owners of ranches in Texas whose holdings aggregate 15,000 head were selling their entire herds. Another rancher told me that he was selling as stock calves on this market 150 calves from pure-bred cows that cost $300 each. The decline has hit the whole bunch, from the wobbly calf to the venerable milk-producing bossie. All are involved in apparently inextricable ruin. And as a further result of this condition now developing there can not fail to ensue a great shortage of meat animals within the next three or four years, which may bring as pronounced an advance in prices as the present decline.

Now, my contention is that there is nothing as important to the cattle raiser as a stable market—a market free from violent fluctuations from day to day. The cattleman does not ask for any special privilege. It requires three to four years to produce a good beef animal. The profits that should be his as a reward for years of the most laborious toil should not be subject to the caprice of a market that by a sudden decline entirely obliterates his profits in the interim between the loading station and their destination.

I am for this bill because I believe to some extent that it will have the effect to stabilize the market for live cattle, and this is desirable from the standpoint of both the consumer's and the producer's interest. It will take away any excuse the packer may advance, as he has hitherto done, that he is prevented from storing meat through fear of prosecution for hoarding. If I may again revert to the ubiquitous high cost of living, I will simply say that we are getting along fine. There probably never was a period in the history of this country when all the people were as well fed, as well clothed, as well paid, as are we, the American people at this particular day and date. Any important reduction in the cost of living means, and must mean, a reduction all along the line; it not only means a reduction in the price of a loaf of bread and the price of meat but it also means a reduction in the price of the merchant's goods, of the manufacturer's profit, in the laborer's wages, and, what is more personal and more vital to every citizen, it will increase the value of the dollar with which we will have to pay the interest on the principal of our prodigious national debt. Will we all be happier when the prices of all the things we buy have gone down when we reflect that all the things that we have to sell are reduced in the same proportion and our fixed charges are paid in dollars much scarcer and dearer because requiring more to be given in exchange for them? [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, a few weeks ago the President of the United States appeared in this Chamber and told the people of the country that the second great cause of a universal distress was the high cost of living, and suggested this distress could be relieved greatly by the passage of some bill similar to the one before the House at this time. At least, this legislation is the outgrowth of the President's speech on that occasion.

This bill deals wholly with the packers of this country. I have only asked to trespass on the time of the committee now to emphasize the fact that in the opinion of the most pronounced proponents of this bill the people will not receive any relief from the high cost of living. If we are to believe the statistics that have been given to us during this debate, we will find that there is not any great considerable amount of food products in cold storage at this time.

I will read from the Bureau of Markets report, which is supposed to be somewhat authentic, or at least the most authentic data we can receive on this subject. I read from that report:

The number of eggs on the 1st of July of this year in cold storage in cases amounted to 7,508,530, a sufficient number of eggs to last the United States, if none were to be used for export purposes, 44 days.

We had in cold storage at that time 87,000,000 pounds of butter—not 1 pound for each man, woman, and child in the United States. Had all of that amount been taken out of cold storage and put on the market, it would have only lasted the consuming public 20 days.

Poultry in cold storage amounted to 48,000,000 pounds. If all the poultry had been taken out, there would have been scarcely more than one-third of a fowl for each inhabitant in the United States, a quantity sufficient if all had their proportionate share to supply the population of this country just one meal. And yet the President of the United States said if all this could be taken out of cold storage and put on the market it would relieve the high cost of living.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If it had been the purpose of the committee to carry out the suggestions made by the President of the United States in regard to this piece of legislation, then I want to ask why it is that the committee has insistently refused to permit any reduction in regard to the time concerning which the commodities may be kept in cold storage? Every attempt to reduce the time has been thwarted by the committee.

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know what has been in the mind of the committee; I am only trying to draw attention of this Congress to the fact that if this bill is passed the people of the United States are going to be disappointed, because it is not going to give them the expected relief. Notwithstanding the impotency of this bill, I shall vote for it, because while it will be a disappointment it may do no harm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, I want to say for the benefit of those who were not in the Chamber when I stated it before that the chairman of this committee and myself are members of the conference committee on the rent bill. That bill must be got through without delay if it is to be of any effect. We worked yesterday before the session of the House and last night until after 11 o'clock. We have a date at 3 o'clock this afternoon, and if we are to permit these features to be brought in in this way, no one can tell how long further consideration of the bill will consume. I regret very much that the gentleman from Ohio has asked permission to take time outside of the regular consideration of the bill. I do not know when during my service I have objected to the extension of time, but under the circumstances I think the gentleman ought not to ask for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield for a question?

Mr. KEARNS. I have the floor now.

Mr. Chairman, in view of all the testimony that has been brought before this committee pertaining to this great question, I can not understand why the bill undertakes to deal with the cold-storage houses and then refuses to function further. It has been clearly shown that the fault is not with the packers. It has been demonstrated that the packer is putting upon the market, as far as the testimony in this case goes, goods at a reasonable price in comparison with the retail price.

I sometimes think that we as Members of Congress find it to our advantage at times to confine our quarreling and fussing and faultfinding to the large corporations of the country because there are so few voters connected with the great corporations in many districts.

But let us for the moment center our attention to the distributer of these products, to the man who is selling food products to the consumer, and we have evidence here as published in the various newspapers—and I will not say it positively, but I believe that statement was sworn to—that cold-storage beef put into the hands of the retailers in this city one day last week was at something less than 17 cents per pound, and yet the consumer who went to the various retail dealers to buy that beef—the cheapest part of it that he could buy was at the rate of 40 cents a pound and from that price it ranged up to as high as 75 cents a pound. In this instance it is not the fault of the packer; it is the fault of the man who distributed that meat to the consumer in the District of Columbia. [Applause.] He is the man who is at fault. If you go to any first-class hotel in this city and undertake to buy ready served a pound of this meat, there is not a Member on the floor of this House who will know whether his bill for that one pound of meat is going to be $3 or $6 when it reaches him. So that the fault of the high cost of living is not entirely traceable to the cold-storage houses, but it is found largely in the fact that the retailer of this country is charging as much as the traffic will bear, and men are becoming accustomed, the housewife has become accustomed—that when he or she goes to the store to purchase anything, as I say, they have become accustomed to paying any price that the retailer may demand. The retailer, as you well know, is tacking on his profits of anywhere from 50 to 500 per cent, and the people of this country are paying it. I heard a story told the other day by a man in this House who lives up in Maine. There was an old Indian whom he called "Indian John," who was in the habit each spring or summer of picking berries and bringing them down to the housewives of the town and selling them. He had always been getting anywhere from 8 to 10 cents a quart, but this year he charged 38 cents, and some good housewife asked him why the increase in the price. The Indian replied, "Helly big damn war somewhere." That is the reason we are charged, and that is the reason the retailers of this country are robbing the purchasing public, because there has been "A helly big damn war somewhere," and the men and women of this country are paying the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the last motion. Mr. Chairman, there has been a good deal of discussion on the question of the high cost of living and some gentlemen who have recently spoken have been referring to the question of percentages. Looking at it from the viewpoint of the consumer, I think I may illustrate the question of percentage and profiteering and get a good idea of the definition of percentage by a little incident that I heard not long ago. It was said that there was a church bazaar, and a young lady in there had a little article that she called to a man present and said, "I want you to tell me what percentage of profit I have made. Here is an article that cost me 10 cents and I have sold it for $10. What is the percentage of profit?" He said, "Miss, that has passed out of percentage into larceny." [Laughter.] And from the viewpoint of the consumer that is the way with the percentage of these profiteers—it is no longer percentage, it is larceny. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That if any provision of this act or the application of such provision to certain circumstances be held unconstitutional, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to circumstances other than those as to which it is held unconstitutional shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: On page 13, line 18, after the word "act," strike out "or the application of such provision to certain circumstances" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or any regulation thereunder as prescribed and formulated by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the membership to this amendment and the subsequent amendment which I shall offer, embracing practically the same thing. The object of this amendment is to effect the provisions of the bill and the regulations thereunder as prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. The language as now appears in the bill relates to the application of such provision to certain circumstances being made unconstitutional. I suggest that is not a very apt phrase of legal legislation—the application of certain provisions to certain circumstances—since the matter to be held unconstitutional must be provisions of the bill or the regulations prescribed under the provisions of the bill, and without desiring to take any unnecessary time in argument, I call the attention of the membership of the committee to this, and I really believe this language should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 13, line 20, after the word "act," strike out the words "the application of such provision to circumstances other than those as to which it" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or any such regulation other than that held unconstitutional."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the chairman of the committee whether this amendment is not a proper amendment?

Mr. WALSH. It is not, because it is in unparliamentary language for one reason.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Massachusetts suggests——

Mr. HAUGEN. I prefer the gentleman to explain his amendment; I am not clear whether it should be done.

Mr. GARD. I did explain it the time before. It is stated in parliamentary and legislative language. It is something which I believe is necessary to be done. In other words, you have section 23 applying to certain circumstances to be held unconstitutional.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; it is the application of the law. It is the circumstances that are held unconstitutional.

Mr. GARD. The application of such provisions to circumstances to be held unconstitutional. In other words, to confine the declaration to certain circumstances taken in connection with the application and the application of the law making it unconstitutional.

What I intend to say is, to strike out this relation to "certain circumstances" and put in "regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture." So, then, you would determine the question of constitutionality or unconstitutionality upon the question of provision and of regulation. I submit that is correct.

Mr. BLACK. Why put in the provision as to the regulations that the Secretary may issue? I do not recall any provision of that kind that Congress has ever passed.

Mr. GARD. Under this law the only authority for the prescribing of regulations is vested in the Secretary of Agriculture, in section 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—yeas 24, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe we passed two sections yesterday, and I ask that we return to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment, which is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] yesterday.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We are under section 14 now. I will let that go, Mr. Chairman. I have not the amendment here.

The CHAIRMAN. The next is section 14. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follow:

Amendment offered by the committee: Page 8, line 18, strike out all of section 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 14. That in construing or administering the provisions of this act, or any regulation thereof, whenever any person subject to the provisions of this act, or any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person, acting for or employed by such person, who alone with any other person shall willfully do or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be in violation of any provision of this act, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter or thing in this act required to be done, or shall cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or shall aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of such violation."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, as under section 14 any individual, partnership, or association would be liable for the acts of a person acting for him or under him, this amendment would make them liable. That is, if it is willingly done, it would hold the agent, and directors, and officers of the organizations responsible.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman accept the amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. I offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, that is a very complicated amendment. I want to call the attention of the committee to several things in connection with it, even if the amendment should be adopted. It certainly requires a change in its language. Now, I do not think the committee intended to use the word "thereof." It says "that in construing or administering the provisions of this act, or any regulation thereof." It does not refer to any regulation of the act. You must mean thereunder.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. This is a copy of the railroad-rate act, and "issued thereunder" should be substituted for "thereof." I accept the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I suggest then an amendment by using the words "issued thereunder" for the word "thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not know exactly how it would appear according to the numbering of the lines of the amendment at the desk. It is in the second line of the copy I have of the amendment where the word "thereof" appears. It seems to me it ought to be stricken out and the words "issued thereunder" inserted in lieu of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: In the second line of the amendment strike out the word "thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the words "issued thereunder," so that as amended the lines will read "that in construing or administering the provisions of this act or any regulation issued thereunder."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, about two-thirds of the way down in the amendment it reads as follows:

Or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done.

I do not see that the word "so" is appropriate in that connection at all, because there has been no reference to that before. They use the word "so" further down, when it comes in in an entirely proper manner. But what does the word "so" in that connection refer to?

Mr. ANDERSON. The language in the act from which this was copied reads, I will say to the gentleman:

Things so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. When you say, "any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done," I do not think the word "so" in that connection refers to anything in the section. I can not relate it to anything that precedes it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The section just previously referred to matters or things in the act required to be done. Then it says, "who shall willfully fail or omit to do anything so required to be done shall be guilty of a violation."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that word, because I do not find anything in the section that it relates to or is connected with. In the next line, where it is required by this act to be done or not to be so done, in that connection it is, of course, appropriate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: In the fourth line from the last of the amendment strike out the word "so."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Now in the concluding sentence it is intended, it seems to me, to establish an offense against those who do or fail to do all these numerous things. I will read it in this connection to show that it fails to do that:

Shall be guilty of an infraction of this act or shall aid or abet therein, shall be guilty of such violation.

What violation?

Mr. ANDERSON. Violation of the act.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. You say "of such violation." There is no violation referred to.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have an amendment at the desk which I think will relieve the gentleman's mind, if he will permit me to offer it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON to the committee amendment: Strike out "who," in line 6, and the words "shall be guilty of such violation," in the last line of the amendment, and insert in lieu of the matter stricken out in the last line the following: "such director, officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such person shall, as well as such person, be guilty of such violation."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the original amendment as amended.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. The amendment has been offered so lately that I can not identify it by line, but I offer an amendment to strike out the phrase in that amendment "alone or with any other person."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. Would the gentleman indicate where the amendment should go?

Mr. GARD. It is on about the fifth or sixth line, after the words "person who." Then follow with the words "alone or with any other person."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Strike out from the sixth line of the committee amendment the words "alone or with any other person."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the gentlemen of the Committee on Agriculture that these words "alone or with any other person" have no legal meaning. The language of the section is complete when you provide for the construing of the law and enforcement of the penalty against "any such person who shall willfully do or cause to be done," and so forth, and these other words are without legal meaning.

Mr. HAUGEN. As I before stated, we followed the language of the act.

Mr. GARD. What act?

Mr. HAUGEN. The rate act.

Mr. GARD. We are not following the language of the rate act. We are supposed to be writing new, affirmative legislation.

Mr. HAUGEN. I can see no harm in striking it out, but we found it there, and I suggest that it remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. That finishes the reading of the bill.

Mr. RUBEY. I want to call the attention of the chairman to this fact, that we passed over section 7, on page 5. It seems to me that the parliamentary situation would be such that it would be necessary to return to that section, having passed it over.

Mr. HAUGEN. We did return to it. The gentleman from Virginia withdrew his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Virginia did not get unanimous consent to withdraw anything, and the section was not read.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then, I suggest that we either vote on the amendment or have it withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The attention of the chairman of the committee was called to that, and the author of the amendment said he would not insist upon it.

Mr. WALSH. That does not relieve the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment was not offered. The section was passed over in order that the amendment might be offered at a later time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia said he would not insist upon it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want about two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. I simply want to correct the RECORD this morning, when the distinguished gentleman on the other side insisted on the statement that there was not any law whereby a State official, magistrate or otherwise, could arrest a man under a Federal statute.

I wish to call attention to section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and the construction thereof by the courts.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think anybody on this side said that a State officer could not arrest a man for an offense.

Mr. BLANTON. It was said that they could not bind him over.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Yesterday we inserted an additional section "11 (a)." I think that is the number of it. I am not clear on the proposition as to whether the number of that section is to be incorporated in section 13 or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that was offered as a new section, No. 12, and it will be necessary to correct the following section.

Mr. PURNELL. Section 13 provided that any person who violates any provision of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9 shall, upon conviction, and so forth, be punished. What I am asking is whether or not section 10 (a), the new section, has been incorporated?

Mr. WALSH. It was voted down.

Mr. PURNELL. Is that the understanding of the chairman of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

Mr. HAUGEN. I demand a separate vote on the Juul amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands a separate vote on the Juul amendment. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the Juul amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JUUL: Page 7, line 25, after the word "particular," insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 12. Nor shall any person ship in commerce any poultry or game if the entrails of such poultry or game were not removed prior to the time of being received for cold storage."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division on the Juul amendment.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late. The Chair had put the question on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair is satisfied that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. As many as are in favor of the passage of the bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 265, nays 4, answered "present" 1, not voting 157, as follows:

OPERATION OF TRANSPORTATION BUSINESS.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the managers on the part of the House I present a conference report on the bill S. 641, an act to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, for printing under the rule.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19; and agree to the same.

JOHN J. ESCH,
E. L. HAMILTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is it about?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. To give you some information about the origin of cold storage, a great historical fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think the debate that has just closed on cold storage is one of the most futile that ever took place in the House of Representatives. I do not think the subject of cold storage should be permitted to pass out of the House without everybody knowing or having their memories refreshed as to who invented it. It was Lord Bacon, who possessed the most powerful brain ever housed in a human skull, and if these beef packers and fruit packers had any gratitude, they would put up a monument to him as high as Washington's.

When he was a very old man, driven from power, disgraced, one snowy day he was traveling along a road in a gig and this idea of preserving fresh meat by the use of ice popped into his head. He got down, bought a chicken, killed it, and stuffed it with snow with his own hands. He was old and feeble, and it caused him to have a cold and a chill and he died in about three days. In the last letter he ever wrote he said, "My fingers are so stiff that I can hardly hold the pen, but the experiment of the fowl and the snow succeeded excellently well." [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen in the House have three legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that all Members have three legislative days to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DUTY ON MAGNESITE ORE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5218. And pending that motion, I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina how much time he would like to have for general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. How much time does the gentleman want on that side?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have application for three hours and a half.

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not want more than an hour and a half on this side. Are you going to limit it to the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I think not. There are a few who want to talk upon other matters.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think in the interest of time we ought not to have more than two hours on a side.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have requests for three hours and a half on this side.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am so anxious to facilitate legislation on these measures that I am willing to cut out these speeches on our side on extraneous matters if the gentleman from Michigan is willing to do it as far as his side is concerned, and let us get down to business.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will talk about nothing else except the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Can not we let them have 30 minutes on a side on extraneous matters?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say 50 minutes on this side. I have a request for that time, but I do not know what the gentleman wants to talk about.

Mr. KITCHIN. Make it two hours and a half on a side, and if necessary at the end of that time we will make other arrangements.

Mr. FORDNEY. We can let it run along with the understanding that at the end of five hours we can agree on closing general debate. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may control one half the time and I control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina control one half the time and the gentleman from Michigan the other half. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. FORDNEY was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ANDERSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5218, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufacture thereof in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, as indicated by the reading of the title, this bill contemplates a tariff on importations of various classes of magnesite, crude and manufactured. In order to understand the actual necessities which are controlling in the presentation of the bill it is necessary to have some general knowledge of the history and environment of the magnesite industry. I desire to say at the outset, for the information of any who may not be fully informed regarding it, that the term "magnesite" is entirely distinguishable from manganese. To-day some one brought to my attention the fact that some gentlemen have been under the impression that this bill relates to the subject of manganese. The fact is that it has no relation whatever to that subject. Manganese, as I understand it, is used as an alloy in the manufacture of steel and enters into the necessary constituency of the product. Magnesite is used for lining metallurgical furnaces and is not an alloy at all. There is no relation between the two subjects. Perhaps the scientific definition of magnesite should be stated. It is somewhat technical, and I will present the statement as contained in the hearings as made by the Bureau of Mines, or by the representative of that bureau, which is as follows:

The mineral magnesite ($MgCO_3$) is a carbonate of metallic magnesium and is a nonmetallic mineral about three times as heavy as water. One of its most notable qualities is its refractoriness; that is, resistance to high temperatures without fusion. There are two varieties, the crystalline and the amorphous. Both are found in the United States, the former in Stevens County, Wash., and the latter in many parts of California.

When calcined or burned, carbonic acid or carbon dioxide gas (CO_2) is driven off and the oxide of magnesium (MgO), which is also known in the trade as magnesite, is left. The latter substance is unquestionably the best material for lining open-hearth steel furnaces, and 90 per cent and possibly more is used for this and other refractory purposes, as in electric furnace linings and in copper and lead furnaces. The crystalline variety appears to be particularly well adapted to this use.

Magnesite is also mixed with various other ingredients, among which are wood, flour, cork, asbestos, silica, talc, coloring material, and magnesium chloride, and used in the form of Sorel cement in the plastic-flooring trade.

It is estimated by the several bureaus which appeared before the committee—and I might say that testimony was adduced upon the part of the Tariff Commission, the Bureau of Mines, and Geological Survey—that there is an available quantity in sight in the United States of 8,000,000 tons of this commodity. Of course there is no accurate or certain knowledge as to the scope and extent of these deposits further than that they have been measured, so far as those in sight are concerned, by taking their dimensions in the different localities where the deposits are found. It is believed and stated by the several bureaus that it is their view that other deposits will be located, and these deposits which have been defined probably have not been fully measured, since in the original exploratory work the depths ascertained and drill holes have not revealed it all. Prior to the war we produced very little magnesite in the United States, indeed. There had been a small amount produced for a number of years, but as late as 1913, the year immediately preceding that in which the European war began, the domestic production was only 9,632 tons. In 1917 we produced 316,000 tons. As the war came into full swing in Europe the demand increased here and the foreign supply was cut off. Increased production was noticeable at once, rising year by year, I think, to some thirty thousand and odd tons in 1915, and in 1916 to 154,000 tons in round numbers; and, as I said, in 1917, at the peak of production, to as much as 316,000 tons. Before the war we produced about 3 per cent of our present requirement in this country. At the close of the war we produced all of our requirement. The testimony of everyone who has appeared before the committee on the point has indicated that the requirements of the country were not only fully met in time of war but that the domestic supply is ample and adequate to meet the requirements in time of peace or war.

When we entered the war in 1917 the foreign importation was cut off. Prior to the war we had relied almost entirely upon Austria for our supply of magnesite. As indicated in the definition read, and in other testimony at the hearings, this is an absolute essential for refractory purposes in the manufacture of steel and other metals requiring the lining of metallurgical furnaces. Therefore, when the war came and it was necessary to speed the production and manufacture of steel, it became vitally necessary to increase the production of magnesite. We had not produced it for refractory purposes. Immediately a call went out to the country, to the far West, where known deposits were, for production. They had no machinery, they had no adequate mills, no kilns, but they provided such facilities as they could, equipped the known mines, and began to produce and ship the raw material to the East, at first, where it was calcined at the brickmaking establishments on the eastern coast. The bricks were furnished in due course to the steel producers or manufacturers. By and by some of the western producers were able to secure kilns of their own. There were some upright kilns, and later some secured the rotary kilns, and gradually they began to produce dead-burned magnesite in required amounts until in the last analysis they met fully the demands of the steel-manufacturing trade. And so, during the war, this industry gradually developed into a self-sustaining position so long as the importations were cut off, but it is anticipated that as soon as normal conditions are restored those importations will come again. Ninety-six per cent of the material used in the United States before the war was imported, and of that 95 per cent was imported from Austria. The Austrian supply will be due to arrive again the moment normal conditions obtain in this country and in the world; and the testimony is conclusive before the committee that the producers of this country can not compete without protection with the importations from Austria.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What duty, if any, did it carry before the war or does it carry now?

Mr. HADLEY. There was no duty; it was on the free list, except an advalorem duty on the brick of which I will speak, the manufactured brick, but the crude material and calcined material carry no duty under existing law.

Now, the American producers not only learned how to produce the material but they learned how to make a good quality of material. Some question was raised at the hearings as to the quality of the material, whether it was as good as that produced in Austria. It appeared that the Austrian product has a composition of iron. They learned that the deposits in Washington contained substantially the identical elements that were found in the Austrian material.

The magnesite deposit in Washington was unknown as such before the war. When they called upon the West for material, prospectors were sent out, and they lined the hills and mountains of the West and discovered this deposit in the State of Washington, which before had been used as building material—used as limestone. It developed that it is a first-class quality of magnesite, and it was mined, manufactured, and used all through the war for refractory purposes. It also developed that it possessed slightly less iron than the Austrian product, and, having learned that, they developed the process of mixing an additional quantity of iron with the material in the process of burning, so that it became the equivalent of the Austrian product.

In that respect it is similar to the development of the cement industry. It will be remembered that for many, many years we depended upon England and Germany for our source of supply of Portland cement. We had a little knowledge of the natural cement rock in three or four States of this country, but it could not compete with the foreign cement. Although the same elements were in the rock as in the foreign material, they had not ascertained a process by which to manufacture the same class of cement as that from abroad. By and by they developed that process, and a protective tariff was placed on imported cement, with the result that instead of a production of 7,000,000 barrels in the year 1890, before we had the tariff, in 1917 we produced more than 90,000,000 barrels. While the production has gone up, the importations have ceased, and as the production has increased the prices have fallen. It is an analogous situation to the one that is presented here. Western producers have learned how, by the synthetic process, to amalgamate the iron with the raw material so as to produce a first-class quality of magnesite, and are able to-day to compete as to quality with any magnesite that is produced in the world.

Now, the great quantities in California are not all of that class. There are two mines in California that produce ferromagnesite, containing the iron. The same quality of material is produced in Austria. There are two in Washington. There are others in California that produce a class of material that is susceptible, upon the mixing of the iron, of combination into the same class of material as the natural ferromagnesite. That is substantiated by a statement contained in a pamphlet just issued on the 16th of this month on the mineral resources of the United States, 1918, Department of the Interior, United States Geological Survey. I read from the bulletin, on page 146:

> Two properties in the State, one in Napa County and one in Sonoma County, have natural ferromagnesite ore, which has been found satisfactory to use in refractory products, such as furnace lining and bricks. Magnesite from other California mines has been used for the same products by adding a small quantity of iron. California magnesite, as a rule, is preferred over Washington magnesite for plastic uses, because it burns whiter.

Now, on page 150, this publication states:

> During the last three years a very large part of the California magnesite has been used for refractory purposes, and it is worthy of note that the entire output of the White Rock mine in Napa County, the largest producer in the State in 1918, is used by the Pacific coast steel plants in their basic open-hearth and electric furnaces. The Refractory Magnesite Co.'s mine at Preston likewise yielded a natural ferromagnesite which was made into refractory brick at Stockton and used by smelters in California and Utah. The natural ferromagnesite of these two mines has made California a reputation for magnesite suitable for refractory as well as for plastic purposes. Whether the amorphous magnesite of California and the crystalline magnesite of Washington are equally suitable for refractory uses, in spite of claims for each, is a question which has arisen, but, so far as the survey knows, has not been answered with incontrovertible evidence. From the little evidence in hand it would seem that technically they may be of equal value and that choice between them is based on results of calcination, difference in cost delivered to consumer, and time required for receipt of shipments.

I read that statement from the Geological Survey because at the hearings the impression was made to obtain to some extent that the California material was useful only for the purpose of the plastic trades and not for refractory purposes, and that therefore the company which had been producing it so extensively in Washington from the first-class material would be in a position to create and control a monopoly of the business.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will my colleague state when that statement was made by the Geological Survey?

Mr. HADLEY. The statement I have just read?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. It is contained in a pamphlet entitled "Mineral Resources of the United States, 1918," published September 16, 1919.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Long enough afterwards——

Mr. HADLEY. Published two months after the hearings on this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. What action has the Tariff Commission taken on the subject? Have they made a report to the Committee on Ways and Means from which the committee acted?

Mr. HADLEY. A representative of the Tariff Commission appeared before the committee, was there practically throughout the hearings, and testified fully. His testimony will be found in the hearings. I refer to Mr. Riddell, representing the commission.

Mr. RAKER. Did the entire Tariff Commission take the matter up and agree to this rate as specified in the bill?

Mr. HADLEY. They sent to the committee one representative, who testified before the committee. They did not testify as to the rates, if the gentleman is asking about that. They only testified upon the character of the material, the quantity and quality, and those matters concerning which they had compiled information.

Mr. RAKER. Did they also give evidence as to the cost of production abroad and the question of transportation across here?

Mr. HADLEY. So far as they had information. I will come to the cost of production.

Mr. RAKER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman. I wanted to know if the committee had gone into it.

Mr. HADLEY. I want to speak further about this matter of quality, inasmuch as so many things have been said regarding the quality. I know that some circularization has occurred, and I think it would be proper to refer to some things that were inserted in the course of the hearings and some that were presented after the hearings.

In the course of the hearings Dr. Manning, of the Bureau of Mines, appeared on the 17th of July, and he introduced into the RECORD a letter in response to one that he had written to the largest brick manufacturer in the United States—that is, the largest manufacturer of magnesite brick—on the question of quality, and, among other things, it contains this statement——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will have to ask for more time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman five minutes. I would like to ask the Chairman if there is not some mistake about the counting of the time. It does not seem to me that the gentleman has occupied 25 minutes.

Mr. HADLEY. I can not cover this subject in any such time as this. I will require at least 15 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HADLEY. It contains this statement as to the quality of the Washington magnesite as compared with Austrian magnesite:

As to the quality of the Washington magnesite in comparison with the Austrian magnesite, we have substituted it for the Austrian materials for every purpose for which we have used or sold the Austrian magnesite, either in the manufacture of steel, copper, or other metals. We believe it is impossible to make an exact comparison between the Washington and the Austrian magnesite, and can see no conclusive evidence that the Washington is inferior to the Austrian. Some of the largest consumers of magnesite for steel making have told us that the Washington magnesite as now produced is as good as the Austrian. Records made during the past few years can not be absolutely relied upon unless it is known precisely what material was used in the manufacture. Brick have only been manufactured exclusively from Washington magnesite since the middle of 1918, and there were considerable stocks of older material on hand to be worked up.

One statement, selecting merely one class from each class of persons interested, is found in the hearings in a letter addressed to Mr. FORDNEY, chairman of the committee, by the Metal & Thermit Corporation, of New York. Selecting a short extract from that statement, on page 208 of the hearings, I read as follows:

METAL & THERMIT CORPORATION,
New York, June 21, 1919.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee, Washington, D. C.

* * * * * * *

We consider the conditions under which we use magnesite to be severer than the conditions under which magnesite is used by the steel companies in their open-hearth furnaces, as in our process magnesite has to withstand a heat in excess of 5,000° F. and a severe wearing abrasive action due to the flow of steel and slag.

Previous to the war we used Austrian magnesite, and, as explained in our article, we had a great deal of trouble in the early part of the war to obtain a proper magnesite, but now frankly state that the domestic magnesite we now obtain and use is equal or superior to the Austrian magnesite which we used before the war.

This is brought to your attention so that you may know all the facts in reference to magnesite.

Yours, very truly,

METAL & THERMIT CORPORATION,
FRED W. COHEN,
Assistant General Manager.

Then inclosed is a statement to the same effect, appearing at page 209 of the hearings, which they published several months before this bill was introduced in a publication known as "Reactions." I might quote also from other communications received, not only from the steel men, but from the plastic trade and others interested in the question of quality, but the limited time I have at my disposal will not permit.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman was born, as I understand, in Park County, Ind., just adjacent to Fountain County?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Before the war it was said that over in Fountain County they had found a substance that would make brick that would bear with impunity a large amount of heat. They established a brickyard at my town of Danville, in Vermilion County, or near there, and shipped that product over to the brickyard. It did not do a great deal of good, but there was the plant, and during the war, my understanding is—although I can not speak exactly about it—that that brickyard turned out a large amount either of magnesite or of brick that was far superior to fire brick. But my understanding is—and I presume it is correct, although I never was at that brickyard—that since the war closed that brickyard has closed, and I think, if I recollect aright, that somebody in Pittsburgh who had a factory bought that brickyard and possibly owns it now. But I think it is not being operated. Does the gentleman know anything about the deposit of magnesite in Fountain County, Ind.?

Mr. HADLEY. I do not. The gentleman's statement, however, is very interesting.

Now, I spoke of the fact that some point had been raised as to whether there was a possibility of a monopoly, and when I have disposed of that point in a few words I will come to the consideration of the rates. The largest producer owns one-eighth of the total known deposits in the country, and one-eighth only, and this company has never produced to exceed more than approximately one-third of the output. In California a statement just issued in this publication, "Magnesite in 1918," by the Geological Survey, shows the production in 10 counties of that State. I have already referred to the extensive mining districts in that State. There were 65 producing companies in California in 1917, and this company to which reference has been made has no interest, as the record shows, in any producing mine in the State of California. A company that has only one-eighth of the raw material and has never produced to exceed more than one-third of the output, and is competing with many going concerns in the State of California when the conditions permit them to operate, has no opportunity to create or control a monopoly.

The bill as reported by the committee provides for three classes of rates: One-half cent a pound on commercial ore; three-fourths of a cent a pound on magnesite calcined, dead-burned and grain; and three-fourths of a cent a pound on magnesite brick and 10 per cent ad valorem. After very full hearings before the committee and thorough consideration in subsequent sessions, the committee reached the conclusion that these rates were necessary and for the time perhaps adequate, in its best judgment, for the protection of the industry.

Briefly, then, with respect to these classes of material, it costs on the average $25.13 at the mines to produce the dead-burned material on the Pacific coast. It costs $16.07 to transport it to the point of distribution on the eastern coast, or $41.20 per ton delivered at the site of consumption and distribution.

I am speaking of dead-burned magnesite, and in order to classify the material more fully I may state that the raw material when burned down to the point where from 2 to 4 per cent of gas remains is then suitable for the plastic trade. If it be taken out and used for that purpose, it is plastic-trade material; but if it is desired to use it for a refractory purpose, it is further burned to the point of the expulsion of all the gas as nearly as possible, usually leaving perhaps about one-half of 1 per cent. But at that point it is known as dead-burned material. In its use for plastic purposes some gas must be retained, because it must be sufficiently active so that when combined with the liquid which is used in combination with it for flooring and plastic purposes generally it must have the gas sufficient for chemical action so as to combine properly and adhere or set. But when the gas is driven off as nearly as possible, it is then inert and inactive, and is called dead-burned magnesite.

So in the first classification of the bill we have the rate on the crude material. In the second we have the rate on the dead-burned or calcined magnesite, and in the third subdivision we have the rate on brick. The reason for providing the rate on brick in addition to the ad valorem rate is that a specific rate is necessary, because if we have a rate adequate upon the dead-burned material it will not be protected unless there is a sufficient rate upon imported brick. Otherwise they could manufacture the brick abroad, import it, break it up, and have dead-burned magnesite free, because the brick consists of nothing more nor less than dead-burned magnesite pressed together with water.

As to the comparative cost, we know the cost of producing the material in this country. Sworn statements of cost were filed with the committee by at least six of the producing companies, two in Washington and four in California. We also know what the prewar cost was at the Atlantic seaboard on the importation of Austrian magnesite. It was about $16 a ton. Therefore if the present cost, transportation included, of domestic magnesite be compared with that of prewar Austrian magnesite at the Atlantic seaboard, the difference between $41.20 and $16 and some cents represents the differential which would be required if these standards of comparative cost were maintained after the war, or $25 a ton. This bill was introduced upon the theory that the cost in Austria would fall to the point where in comparison with the large increase in wages that we have had in this country that differential would continue to obtain.

The committee were unable to secure a statement as to the exact foreign cost at this time. The House will appreciate the difficulty of securing information of that kind at present, but we do know that a quotation has been made on Austrian magnesite of $26.50 on the dead-burned material at the Atlantic seaboard, and it costs $41.20 to lay it down there from our western mines. That makes a differential at the moment of $14.70, and the committee have recommended a tariff of $15 a ton, which covers that difference. And yet the transportation rate of $7.50 fixed by the Shipping Board for the emergency fleet vessels to carry returning ballast to this country from abroad is not the rate which is going to obtain in normal times. Transportation rates will be less, and this brings up the subject of freights. Some discussion arose in the course of the hearings as to whether freight should be properly included as an element of cost in a matter of this character. Upon that subject I desire to make this statement. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. HADLEY. May my time be extended five minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HADLEY. The rates reported take into consideration in part only the element of freight as an item of cost. In the case of this essential war industry, if it should become necessary upon full developments as to costs, both here and abroad, to treat all domestic freight as an item of cost, I know of no sufficient reason why that should not be done. The material is on the Pacific coast. The chief points of consumption are on the Atlantic coast. Distribution must occur at the seat of manufacture. It must always be borne in mind that the industry in question is essential in peace and indispensable in war. The case presents a distinction between an essential war industry and an ordinary commercial peace-time industry. Whatever may be said of freight as an element of cost, as a general policy, that is beside the issue here. The question is national and not local. A sound and safe national policy demands that America be always self-reliant and independent with respect to war materials and war munitions. That premise seems too obvious to require comment or argument. Yet it is lamentably true that on the declaration of war against Germany the United States was practically dependent upon Germany's friend and ally, Austria, for this war mineral, and only a little later we found ourselves actually at war with Austria herself, a situation most deplorable and dangerous. To permit its recurrence is unthinkable. To maintain such a key industry every legitimate and necessary element of cost at the point of distribution and consumption should be included in determining the differential on which import duties are to be predicated. The differential in costs consists mainly in the difference in the amount paid for labor in the United States and in Austria, plus the difference in the cost of transportation. American labor receives an average of about 70 per cent of production cost and about 54 per cent of the amount paid for transportation. It would indeed be an ill return to the splendid record of our western producers if by any error now in measuring the necessary protection for the magnesite industry, to insure its survival, we should permit it to perish, throw out of employment hundreds of American laborers, destroy American war-time investments from which no profits have yet been withdrawn, send American money abroad to employ foreign labor, and rob American railroads of millions of dollars in freights.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? He is familiar with this subject and his statement is very instructive.

Mr. HADLEY. Just for a question. I have not much time left.

Mr. RAKER. What is the attitude of the eastern manufacturers in regard to this legislation?

Mr. HADLEY. I will predicate this statement upon the attitude of one brick manufacturer who owns a deposit of magnesite in Austria and who was operating there before the war. This manufacturer appeared before the committee and opposed the bill. Two or three competing manufacturers, larger than that one, I understand, did not appear and have not opposed the bill. So far as the steel companies are concerned, they have not appeared before the committee, so far as I have any recollection, and I have no knowledge that they are opposed to the bill. If they are, I do not know it.

If I had had time to detail it, I would have discussed the amount of freight for railroad transportation, $3,000,000 annually during the war; and I would have gone into the amount invested in this industry, $1,000,000 in one plant, $1,000,000 in another, and $1,500,000 in others, or $3,500,000 in all.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes; for a question.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I hope the gentleman from Washington will not hesitate to reply to interrogatories on account of lack of time. I believe he should be accorded full time to enlighten the House upon this measure.

Mr. HADLEY. I will be glad to do so, if I can get the time.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I recognize that in the time allotted to him he hesitates to yield. I think the chairman of the committee will be willing to assure the gentleman that he may have all the time he desires.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to say that in his replies to my questions he has been exceedingly kind. I thought a little bit more so than some others, because sometimes when gentlemen get the floor they will not yield for anything; but the gentleman from Washington has been very kind, and has not only been ready to yield, but to give the House information. I compliment him upon his splendid attitude in relation to the matter.

Mr. HADLEY. I will be very glad to yield to any gentleman if I have the time.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HADLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARBOUR. A little while ago the gentleman mentioned the cost of production in this country and in Austria, and he mentioned as one of the elements of the differential the difference in the cost of labor. Is the gentleman prepared to state to the House what is the difference in the labor cost? What are the prevailing wages of the miners and laborers on the Pacific coast in this country, and in Austria?

Mr. HADLEY. The going wages for a common laborer in the magnesite industry on the Pacific coast during the war was $4 a day, and from that up to $10 for skilled labor. It is $4.50 to-day, having advanced 50 cents since the armistice. So far as the rate of wages in Austria is concerned the committee has no definite information upon the present going rate. They do know that the wages in Austria were not in any way comparable with the wages here before the war. The highest rate of wage that I heard mentioned in the testimony before the committee was suggested by a witness on behalf of the American Refractory Co., operating a mine in Austria, and it was stated that the wage was $1.10 a day, while some statements indicated that it was 50 cents a day, and a less rate for women workers.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is the gentleman familiar with the statement issued by the Bureau of Mines that where the wages were discussed that men employed in the magnesite mines got 40 and 50 cents, and the women 20 cents a day?

Mr. HADLEY. Current wages or prewar wages?

Mr. BARBOUR. Current wages; at the present time.

Mr. RAKER. One other question: As a matter of fact, with the rates now and for some time past there has been no importation of magnesite from Austria, has there?

Mr. HADLEY. None since prior to the war.

Mr. RAKER. From the hearings it appears that all the magnesite has to come through Fiume, and Fiume is in difficulty, is it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. In August there were 900 tons came in from Austria.

Mr. RAKER. Notwithstanding the war conditions?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HADLEY. I would like 10 minutes more.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Was it not brought out in the hearings that magnesite is brought back here as ballast in our ships that were sent over with food? They bring it back as ballast at nominal rates. That was brought out in the hearings.

Mr. RAKER. One other question: Through what method and what means are you able to secure information as to the cost of labor in Austria within the last four years? We want the facts.

Mr. HADLEY. I stated that the committee labored under difficulty in being able to secure information as to the current cost of production during the war in Austria. But we know what the cost was before the war, and we know a quotation has been made on magnesite at the Atlantic ports since our hearings which would require the differential of rates in this bill on dead burned magnesite to meet it. I am informed, upon information which I believe to be reliable but which I have not been able to verify, that rates much lower than the rates named by the Shipping Board have already been made for shipments to this country within the last month or two, and that a rate less than that named by the Shipping Board on magnesite is likely to be made if application is made for transportation.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will permit, nobody wants to give any misinformation to the House or the country. I put the question if within the last two and a half years mining wages have not gone from $2.50 to $8 a day?

Mr. HADLEY. I have stated that the wages in the magnesite industry were from $4 to $10.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not fair to presume that wages in European countries have increased in proportion to the wages here, if not a great deal more?

Mr. HADLEY. I have no doubt that they have increased to some extent, but I do not believe that any country in which the kronin has decreased in value from 20 cents to 2 cents—I do not believe that under that depreciated state of currency and under the conditions that the people of Austria were in during the war that the same relative standard of wages will obtain there that obtained here. In other words, that the increase can not be commensurate with the standard we have maintained here following the war.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. HADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have information on wages in Germany in the potash mines which was obtained in Germany within less than two months. It would be a fair presumption that wages paid in the magnesite mines in Austria-Hungary would bear some relation to those in the potash mines in Germany. In the potash mines in Germany the wages were 10 cents, or half a mark, an hour before the war. Based on the value of their mark now, which is greatly depreciated, there is a great increase, but on the basis of value of the gold dollar now the wages are 13 or 14 cents an hour where they were 10 and 12 before the war.

Mr. HADLEY. Now, gentlemen, I will finish my statement:

If there was no question of difference in labor costs involved, the fact would still remain that in the case of a cross-continent haul producers can not compete with ballast shipped in sailing vessels from trans-Atlantic ports. Nevertheless, when 90 per cent of the domestic production of magnesite is required for refractory purposes, for the trifling consideration of a few cents added to the cost of a ton of steel, America never should, and I do not believe she ever will, forfeit this heritage to Austria merely because nature has stationed this mineral resource on the shores of one ocean and the laws of trade her manufactories on the shores of another. Between them is one Nation and one people. Within that broad domain America will not penalize any section of this land or any domestic industry in favor of any foreign producers, foreign people, or foreign power.

Whether the magnesite industry of the United States can survive under the rates recommended by the committee time alone can certainly reveal, but there can be no reasonable doubt that without such relief upon return to normal conditions it must inevitably and immediately perish. The proposed duty will add but a few cents to the cost of a ton of steel. It is a matter of little consequence to the consumer. It is a question of great moment to the producer. But above all rises the paramount interest of the public in the perpetuity of a war industry essential to national preparedness for the purpose of national defense.

Practically the only substantial opposition to this bill was that interposed by the American Refractories Co., a domestic manufacturer of magnesite brick made before the war from material produced by its Austrian company, the Austro-American Magnesite Co., from its Austrian mines. It is a significant fact that none of its brick-manufacturing competitors offered any objection. The inability of this company to provide this country with raw material required for war purposes in time of war is a sufficent answer to its protest, which if given effect would now destroy the very industry on which, in common with our country, it relied in war, and would found upon its ruins a servile reliance upon its own Austrian source of supply.

All that the domestic producers ask is that they be sufficiently protected to meet foreign competition on equal, and not on prohibitive, terms. On the basis of such facts as it could ascertain and its best judgment as to future competitive conditions the committee has undertaken by the rates it reported to afford exactly that degree of protection, no more and no less. In the present circumstances it is obvious that a rate too low to insure such protection is the equivalent of no rate at all, and if adopted the calamity it is sought to avert would befall before it could be corrected.

It is the purpose of this bill to protect an American enterprise which furnished a product in time of war vitally essential to the very existence of our Government as against foreign importations which in time of peace suppled the trade and furnished the basis for splendid profits, but which in time of peril could not contribute in the slightest degree to the defense of the country. Such an enterprise has earned the right to live. The country can not afford to permit it to languish or perish. [Applause.]

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROSE. I notice that the gentleman is very anxious to have all the facts brought out before the committee to-day, and I have felt that in order that the committee may be advised as to some objections raised to this bill I would like to present to them a few comments made by Mr. Burke, a former Member of this House, and who is at present attorney for one of the refractory companies——

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman kindly do that in his own time? I yielded for a question, not a statement.

Mr. ROSE. Since the gentleman is familiar with what Attorney Burke has said in the interest of his company, I would like to know what is the answer of the committee to the comments made by him at the hearing?

Mr. HADLEY. That is a general question, which would take another 15 minutes to answer. I will answer specific questions. Those questions will be covered by interrogation under general debate or under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's contention is that during the war this material was short, and these people went out and spent their money in a pioneering way to develop this industry, and if these institutions are maintained in time of peace if we have trouble in the future we will have a supply on hand, because it is an absolute necessity in time of war as well as in time of peace?

Mr. HADLEY. That is the gist of the statement. The rates fixed in this bill are necessary to preserve it.

Mr. RAKER. The rates thus fixed will not create a monopoly, but will at the same time permit these western institutions who have put their money in it to maintain this as an American institution?

Mr. ROSE. That is the contention on one side, but it is denied on the other.

Mr. RAKER. I am asking the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. HADLEY. I will say in answer to the interpolation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it was denied by the people who were producing Austrian magnesite before the war and nobody else, so far as the record of these hearings are concerned. I do not blame them; they want to leave the field wide open after the war. As I say, I do not blame them for wanting to reenter without the competition here. I do not attribute any sinister purpose; I think they have the right to transact business on such terms if they can, but it is not——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Just one minute.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. RAKER. Then the gentleman's contention is that if this industry as it now exists was discontinued, we would have to go to foreign countries to get magnesite?

Mr. HADLEY. I have said that several times.

Mr. RAKER. I wanted to get it specifically in the RECORD.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. WELLING. Before the gentleman sits down will he state how much money is invested in this enterprise?

Mr. HADLEY. It is estimated at $3,500,000—$2,000,000 in the State of Washington and $1,500,000 in the State of California. A million dollars in each of two plants in the State of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. KITCHIN. Before the gentleman does that will he permit me to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON]?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly. I will withhold that until the gentleman can yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a short clipping from a newspaper on cheap shoes for export.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a report on cheap shoes for export. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I did not understand the gentleman's request.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. What is the subject of the article?

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. The article is on cheap shoes for export.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted, I extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a clipping from the Urich Herald, a newspaper published at Urich, Henry County, Mo., entitled "Cheap shoes for export."

CHEAP SHOES FOR EXPORT.

A day or two after the published threat of still another jump in the price of shoes an advertisement appeared in the New York Journal of Commerce of 300,000 pairs of men's arctics and 170,000 pairs of men's shoes "ready to ship at once direct from our own factories" for export at prices that excite curiosity. There were, for instance, 59,000 pairs of men's work shoes at $3, "made two full soles, solid leather insoles and counter, solid lift heels." Other work shoes are offered at $2.25, $2.35, $1.80, and $2.50. The highest price quoted is $5.75 a pair for "men's gun-metal calf high-grade shoes." The fair sex is not forgotten; 2 of the 12 items provide it with kid shoes at $3.25, and "welt oxford and high shoes" at $1.75 a pair.

After all possible allowances are made for retail risk and profit there remains between these export prices and those the American public is forced to pay a gap too wide to be filled by any excuse of trade necessity. Taken in connection with increased profits reported by shoemaking firms to investors, the export figures suggest inescapable alternatives, remarks the New York World. Either these shoes are of a quality that will do American trade no good abroad or people at home are paying too much. (Mosby's Missouri Message.)

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, Postmaster General Burleson, in his communication to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, under date of September 24, seems to labor under the misapprehension that he need not furnish the House information it has by resolution requested him to furnish, because in his judgment the committee originally reporting the resolution to the House and recommending its consideration did not have jurisdiction. The Post Office Department, like any other governmental department, is responsible to Congress, which regulates the manner in which it shall function and appropriates the funds necessary. Congress may even go so far as to remove the head of this department if he is guilty of such malfeasance as to justify such condign punishment. And when upon the suggestion that the Postmaster General is guilty of maladministration the House orders him to furnish facts upon which it may base its judgment in the premises, it is his plain duty promptly to furnish them.

The House of Representatives writes its own rules and alone construes them. The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is vested by those rules with jurisdiction over all matters dealing with reform, that is, change or improvement in the civil service. Its jurisdiction is not limited to the classified civil service. It deals with every employee of the Government who has the status of a civilian. Only the armed forces of the United States are excluded from its jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction embraces the appointment, qualifications, service, tenure, and removal of such civil employees. The Speaker most properly referred the resolution, when it was originally introduced, to this committee and the House acquiesced in the jurisdiction of the committee when it accepted its report. Even should there exist a difference of opinion regarding the jurisdiction of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service originally and the determination of the House upon it, the action of the House nevertheless is final and the right of review is not vested in even so competent and impartial an authority as Postmaster General Burleson.

In this letter to the Speaker, by means of which Mr. Burleson seeks to camouflage his disobedience of the mandate of the House, he points out that all nominations made since the Executive order of March 31, 1917, have been made in compliance with the terms of that order. This has never been questioned. No one has suggested that he has submitted for appointment persons in direct defiance of the Executive order. The charge is that he has refused in very many instances to submit names in compliance with this order where such compliance would not coincide with his personal or political desires. He admits that there exists at the present time 786 vacancies in postmasterships of the presidential class, which apparently are left unfilled because of his unwillingness in that appalling number of cases to yield obedience to the President. While it was well known that in a number of cases vacancies have been unfilled for a year or more because of the Postmaster General's failure to coerce the Civil Service Commission to change its ratings in compliance with his desires, it was not believed that his contumacy and effrontery had developed to such astounding proportions that 786 of the most important post offices throughout the country are left without permanent appointees to administer them. He speaks of 466 of such cases being still in the hands of the Civil Service Commission. It will be interesting to note, should he eventually comply with the House resolution, how many of these cases are still in the hands of the Civil Service Commission because of rereference by the Postmaster General on the ground that the original ratings were improper.

In my remarks of September 11 advocating the adoption of the resolution, I called attention to the situation in my home city, Newark, N. J., where a first-class post office, serving a population of 400,000, has remained without a permanent head since May 1, 1918, and where the Postmaster General refuses to submit the name of the highest eligible, notwithstanding the fact that the Civil Service Commission has definitively refused to change the rating at the insistence of the Post Office Department.

In the course of my remarks I quoted from the Acting Postmaster General's letter in so far as it was pertinent to the matter at issue. He referred in this letter to the fact that Mr. Bock, the highest eligible, was formerly postmaster at Newark, having been appointed by President Taft, and during the early part of the first Wilson administration was recommended for removal by two post-office inspectors for undue political activity, which recommendation was approved by the chief inspector. In view of the fact that the Civil Service Commission reviewing this finding reversed it, acquitted Mr. Bock of this charge, and the Postmaster General permitted him to serve the three years of his term remaining, this vindication could not possibly lower his rating at the hands of the Civil Service Commission which had cleared him. I consequently deemed it unnecessary to becloud with it a clear-cut issue. Since the Postmaster General does not appreciate the consideration I showed him by my course, I have no longer any hesitancy in making public the facts of this episode. When the charge was lodged against Postmaster Bock two post-office inspectors were sent to Newark to make an investigation. They took statements of a number of people in the city of Newark; they thereupon falsified certain of the statements, and on the basis of the statements so falsified made their report, which received the formal approval of the chief inspector. When the papers were referred to the Civil Service Commission the suspicions of that body were aroused on the face of the case, and Mr. Doyle, of the commission, was sent to Newark to make a personal investigation. He discovered the fact that the statements of several persons had been altered and procured from them correct statements and also affidavits to the fact that the earlier statements had been falsified. Upon this showing the case against Postmaster Bock was dismissed. It is well to note that in this instance the Postmaster General did not press the Civil Service Commission for a reversal of its judgment, but permitted Postmaster Bock to serve without question the remaining three years of his term. However, one of the post-office inspectors guilty of falsifying the statements has since been promoted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back whatever time may be remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back eight minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to use any time now? If not, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, speaking of the Postmaster General reminds me I have a little information from my district that I will be glad to furnish members of the committee. The large cities are not the only cities in which the Postmaster General and his organization are active. A town of 3,000 inhabitants in my district is one of the thrifty little cities of the country, and has, I think, for a Democratic postmaster the most efficient postmaster in the State. He took the post office at a time when it was rated as the second lowest grade in the State of Kansas, and he has builded it up until it is now rated as one of the best-kept post offices in the State. I have it from him and from others who are absolutely familiar with the fact that his removal from that office there in the last month is due to two things, and I think it very well to illustrate the way they are administering the civil service. First, the Democratic national committee, since his appointment as postmaster, has every two years assessed him $250, and to be specific and definite as to how that assessment is handled they mailed a special-delivery letter to his house, special directions on the envelope, letter demanding the $250.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What was this—a second-class post office?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes; a second-class post office.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the compensation of the postmaster?

Mr. TINCHER. I do not know exactly. He did not tell me the figures.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. An assessment of $250 is a very large percentage.

Mr. TINCHER. That is not the only assessment. I will tell you the other. He was also required to attend a meeting of the postmasters of that congressional district at Hutchinson, Kans., which is the largest city in the district, every year, and there he was notified by the Democratic national committee that he must pay 5 per cent of his salary to the campaign fund for the congressional candidate. And I want to say that this man I am talking about is honest, because I met him on the streets of his city and he was the only postmaster who was candid with me. He said to me, "I am going to violate the law, because I am going to do what little I can, without your catching me at it, for your opponent." He was candid enough to say that he was going to do that. That is the stripe of the man he is. And he did as he said he was going to do. But for some reason, like the high cost of living, he tried the experiment of not paying his assessments. He did not pay the $250 last year. He was removed, and I have had no knowledge from him until just a few days ago. As I said, he did not pay the 5 per cent, although the gentleman who was candidate for Congress wrote him and spoke plainly enough on that, and even wrote him after election and said, "I was defeated because people like you, occupying Government positions, failed to do your duty." That came from a then Member of this House, who has since gone into higher official life in this city. But the gentleman has been removed from the office of postmaster in his city. Not only that, but the distinguished gentleman who removed him has been to his town, and in spite of the examination that was held, and although the examination was a competitive one, announced who his successor was to be. This successor, when they sent a personal representative there and tried to straighten out these back dues, straightened them up, and is to have the post office.

I was inspired to say this by the speech that I have just listened to by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], a thing that may throw a little light on the way they are handling the civil-service proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANDERSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

WEDNESDAY, October 1, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in all our work we seek to come upon those high levels on which Thou dost compose the varied and conflicting interests of mankind. We work from Thee that we may transcribe Thy law into our human rule of action. We pray that Thou wilt lay Thy hand upon the unrest of the country, that Thou wilt bring into finer and more human and more divine understanding and relationship all the conflicting interests, and that we may live on a plane where God leads us in a blessed brotherhood and in a community of interest. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NELSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

OPERATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, some days ago, during the discussion of the treaty, some comment was made regarding the activities of Mr. Bernard M. Baruch in connection with the peace conference, and particularly as to the assignment of the sum of $150,000 by the President for the use of the commission upon which the United States was represented by Mr. Baruch. I wrote Mr. Baruch shortly afterwards, asking him to give a detailed statement of the activities of the board to which he had been assigned, together with the actual expenditures incurred on behalf of the United States, and how they were paid, together with a summary of his work upon the War Industries Board during the war. These he has supplied me with, and I ask unanimous consent to insert these summaries in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summaries were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF PARIS OPERATIONS.

"Mr. Bernard M. Baruch arrived in Paris, at the call of the President, on January 11, 1919, to serve as one of the economic advisers of the American commission to negotiate peace. He was appointed technical adviser to the American peace commission, American delegate on the economic drafting committee, and one of the American representatives on the reparation commission, the economic commission, and the supreme economic council.

"When first called to Paris, Mr. Baruch was directed to bring only a secretary, hence could not at that time bring with him any of the technical experts and business men who were required to assist him in carrying out the work connected with the various assignments given him by the American commission. Realizing the need for such assistants to protect America's interest in the peace processes, he wrote the President on February 4, 1919, asking permission to call to Paris a number of men qualified to assist and advise him in his work for the commission and suggesting the need of funds to defray the expenses of creating and maintaining the proposed organization. To this request the President immediately replied on the following day, expressing approval of the plan that Mr. Baruch should bring over 8 or 10 of these men, and stating that in his opinion the best way to handle the expense would be through an allotment to the peace commission from the fund at the President's disposal. Accordingly, on February 14, 1919, the President signed an Executive order providing as follows:

"In order that Bernard M. Baruch, heretofore designated as a technical adviser of the American commission to negotiate peace, may be able properly to undertake the performance of such duties as have heretofore been, or may hereafter be, assigned to him by the American commission to negotiate peace, I hereby allot to the American commission to negotiate peace the sum of $150,000 from the appropriation for national security and defense authorized in the general deficiency bill approved April 17, 1917; said sum to be subject to the disposal of Bernard M. Baruch for the purpose of creating and maintaining such organization, supplementary to that maintained by the American commission to negotiate peace for the carrying forward of its other activities as said Bernard M. Baruch may find necessary.

"This order shall take effect this 14th day of February, 1919.

"Thereupon Mr. Baruch called to Paris the following persons to act as his assistants and advisers:

"Mr. Alex Legge, vice chairman of the War Industries Board, and in private life vice president of the International Harvester Co.;

"Mr. Charles H. MacDowell, Chief of the Chemical Division of the War Industries Board and president of the Armour Fertilizer Works;

"Mr. Fred K. Nielsen, attorney and expert on commercial treaties, formerly with the Department of State;

"Mr. John C. Pennie, patent attorney;

"Dr. F. W. Taussig, chairman of the United States Tariff Commission;

"A. M. Patterson, expert in textiles; and

"Mr. Donald Riley, lieutenant commander in United States Navy, chemical expert.

"These gentlemen were accompanied by secretaries, and office accommodations were provided for them and such other clerical help as was necessary outside the Hotel Crillon, in rooms furnished rent free by the French Government, the limited office space furnished to Mr. Baruch at the Hotel Crillon being inadequate for his enlarged organization. This group, augmented by the remaining members of the European mission of the United States War Industries Board, including L. L. Summers, chief technical adviser of the board, who had represented the board in London and Paris since July, 1918, worked steadily and consistently under Mr. Baruch's direction and played an important part in framing the reparational and economic clauses of the German and Austrian treaties, as well as a considerable part in the adjustment of many complex economic problems arising during the armistice period. All of the official expenses of this group, so far as they were not paid by individual members personally, were paid out of the allotment above mentioned. Mr. Baruch and several of his associates defrayed all their expenses, including transportation and automobiles, out of their own pockets.

"Against the allotment of $150,000 but one draft for $25,000 was drawn, and this amount was converted into francs and deposited at interest in a Paris bank. Through the addition of interest and refundments this amount was increased to $25,380.34.

"The expenditures from this account during the period from February 14, 1919, to June 30, 1919, totaled $24,128.64, made up as follows:

Transportation and traveling expenses	$3,247.80
Salaries (10 people)	6,771.83
Living allowances, civilians (17 people)	11,634.21
Living allowances, officers	2,176.36
Stamps	28.69
Automobile expense (meals for chauffeurs, medical attention, and taxi hire)	24.00
Office expense	245.75

"The balance of the working fund ($1,251.70, reduced by $161.13 loss in exchange in converting this balance from francs into dollars), $1,090.57, was deposited on August 27, 1919, with the Department of State, together with the final accounting for this allotment.

"After this account had been closed for filing with the Department of State, it was discovered that certain charges for the transportation to and from Europe and necessary travel there of some of the members of Mr. Baruch's organization on Government transports, and the travel expenses of a returning member of his organization, had not been presented to the disbursing agent for Mr. Baruch. These charges total $833.71 and will be charged against this account by the Department of State. After the payment of these charges, therefore, the total unexpended balance of the allotment will be $125,256.86.

"Mr. Baruch received not one cent on account of salary or living allowance from this or any other fund and no part of it was used even for the payment of any of his personal or official expenses; nor was it used for any purpose other than that for which it was allotted, namely, the creation and maintenance of the organization. On the contrary, Mr. Baruch paid certain expenses of an official nature from personal funds. Thus he has reimbursed the Government for the cost of his travel to France on Government transport; and since the fund allotted became unavailable for expenses incurred after June 30, 1919, Mr. Baruch himself paid the salaries and allowances of those of his staff who were required to remain in Paris after that date, amounting to $599.13.

"The work of the peace organization with which Mr. Baruch was associated included assistants and covered a period of approximately five months, the total charges on which totaled less than $25,000.

SUMMARY OF UNITED STATES WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD OPERATIONS.

"When a separate office was established for the raw materials division of the Council of National Defense, in the Munsey Building, Washington, D. C., April 9, 1917, one of the first instructions given by Mr. Baruch was to the effect that he wished to pay all expenses of his office, including office rent, furniture and equipment, and clerical assistance.

"In actually carrying out these instructions, where the Council of National Defense was in position to promptly supply needed equipment or additional force, request was made upon them, and under this arrangement they furnished three or four clerks, and some desks, chairs, typewriters, and other office equipment.

"When the War Industries Board was created, the other members of the board objected to a continuation of the arrangement by which Mr. Baruch paid expenses as above, and beginning August 1, 1917, the Council of National Defense took over the pay roll which Mr. Baruch had been carrying but never reimbursed Mr. Baruch for the amount expended by him for furniture and equipment; nor for rental for his own office space, all of which amounted to more than $5,750.

"During the period from April to August, 1917, in order to cover, so far as possible, all long-distance calls for the office of the commissioner of raw materials, minerals, and metals and to prevent the possibility of personal calls being made at Government expense, a separate telephone was installed for Mr. Baruch's personal account, which did not connect with the switchboard of the Council of National Defense, and this 'phone was continued until the office in the Munsey Building was vacated on October 25, 1917.

"Long-distance telephone calls were checked up by Council of National Defense, and when the call was for personal account a bill was rendered by the Council of National Defense for the charges, so that all personal telephone calls were paid for by Mr. Baruch.

"All personal telegrams were paid for, generally on basis of a monthly statement rendered by the telegraph companies.

"Mr. Baruch always had a personal assistant, whom he either paid personally or who was on a dollar-a-year basis. As chairman of the War Industries Board he had three different persons in the capacity of assistant, two of whom—Messrs. E. T. Corcoran and John F. Smithers—he paid personally, and Mr. Harold T. Clark, who was a volunteer at a dollar a year.

"When Mr. Baruch resigned as chairman of the War Industries Board on December 31, 1918, he arranged to leave in his office his former stenographer, Miss L. Gertrude Ellis, whose name was taken off the pay roll of the War Industries Board as of December 31, 1918, and who has received her salary since that date direct from Mr. Baruch.

"At the time the armistice was signed, on November 11, 1918, the War Industries Board had approximately 1,669 persons on its pay roll, of whom about two-thirds were girls and women. It was felt that with the signing of the armistice and the shutting down of the activities of the several war bodies that had been created in Washington there would immediately develop a large surplus of clerical help and that a great many of the girls and young women who had been brought from their homes to do war work in Washington would be left without jobs and without necessary funds to enable them to return to their homes. It was found that under the law there was absolutely no way in which any of the money that had been appropriated for the activities of the War Industries Board could be used for the purpose of sending these girls and young women to their homes, and Mr. Baruch therefore placed at the disposal of the disbursing officer of the War Industries Board a total of $15,000, to be used to defray the necessary traveling expenses of the female workers for the War Industries Board who wished to return to their homes or to the cities from which they were brought to accept employment with the War Industries Board. This action on Mr. Baruch's part undoubtedly forced and hastened the action of Congress in passing a law providing for similar expenses for Government clerks receiving not to exceed $1,400 per annum, but this bill was not signed and did not become effective until January 7, 1919, and by that time there was an actual shortage of clerical assistance in Washington, which still exists; and while the bill was made retroactive, the delay in its passage undoubtedly resulted in hundreds and perhaps thousands of clerks and stenographers being retained by their respective departments awaiting the signing of the bill, as these war workers were not prepared to provide the necessary funds to get themselves back to their homes. In actual practice the bill was not applicable to more than half a dozen of the employees of the War Industries Board, and out of the appropriation of that board the expenses of only two of its employees were actually paid—one male and one female.

"When the War Industries Board was given the use of the old Fuel Administration Building at Eighteenth and G Streets in the summer of 1918 the building was arranged to provide for a small cafeteria for the employees of the building; but the Government does not provide money for the operation of a cafeteria, so Mr. Baruch was asked to furnish the necessary working capital, which he did in the form of a check for $500, making it possible to operate a cafeteria where every patron was served at an average actual loss of a very small fraction of a cent.

"In July, 1918, Mr. Baruch was authorized by the President to establish a foreign mission of the War Industries Board, with headquarters in London, in connection with the creation and establishment of international executives and the French and British ministries of munitions. This required the expenditure of money to defray expenses, and it was frequently necessary that the money be available in advance. As there apparently was at that time no method by which real cash money could be had from the Treasury in advance of its expenditures, Mr.

Baruch has furnished all the money required to cover the expenses of the foreign mission of the War Industries Board with the exception of transportation charges from the United States, which was provided in most cases out of appropriations of the War Industries Board. Mr. Baruch expended $54,071 to cover expenses of the foreign mission, every dollar of which is covered by voucher, and there has been no reimbursement for this amount or any part of it.

Summary of personal payments made by Mr. Baruch, including payments made as one of the advisers to the American peace mission.

Salaries, equipment, and office rental, 1917	$5,750
Personal assistants	8,350
Transportation of employees	15,000
Cafeteria	500

SPEECHES BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a similar purpose?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the addresses of the President made on certain dates down to September 13.

There being no objection, the addresses of the President were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT AT COEUR D'ALENE, IDAHO, SEPTEMBER 12, 1919.

"Your excellency, my fellow citizens, it is with the greatest pleasure that I find myself facing an audience in this great State. I echo the wish of the governor that it might be our privilege to stay a long time in Idaho and know something more than her fame, know her people, come in contact with her industries, and see the things that we have all so long read about and admired from a distance; but, unfortunately, it is necessary for us to go back to Washington as soon as we can, though it was a great pleasure to escape from Washington. Washington is a very interesting place, but it is a very lonely place. The people of the United States do not live there, and in order to know what the people of the United States are thinking about and talking about it is necessary to come and find out for yourself. That really is my errand.

"I have taken pains since I was a boy so to saturate myself in the traditions of America that I generally feel a good deal of confidence that the impulses which I find in myself are American impulses; but no matter how thoroughly American a man may be, he needs constantly to renew his touch with all parts of America and to be sure that his mind is guided, if he be in public station, by the thoughts and purposes of his fellow countrymen. It was, therefore, with the most earnest desire to get in touch with you and the rest of my fellow countrymen that I undertook this trip, for, my fellow countrymen, we are facing a decision now in which we can not afford to make a mistake. We must not let ourselves be deceived as to the gravity of that decision or as to the implications of that decision. It will mean a great deal now, but it will mean infinitely more in the future. America has to do at this moment nothing less than prove to the world whether she has meant what she said in the past.

"I must confess that I have been amazed that there are some men in responsible positions who are opposed to the ratification of the treaty of peace altogether. It is natural that so great a document, full of so many particular provisions, should draw criticism upon itself for this, that, or the other provision. It is natural that a world settlement, for it is nothing less, should give occasion for a great many differences of opinion with regard to particular settlements of it, but I must admit that it amazes me that there should be any who should propose that the arrangement be rejected altogether, because, my fellow citizens, this is the issue: We went into this Great War from which we have just issued with certain assurances given ourselves and given the world, and these assurances can not be fulfilled unless this treaty is adopted. We told the world and we assured ourselves that we went into this war in order to see to it that the kind of purpose represented by Germany in this war should never be permitted to be accomplished by Germany or anybody else. Do not let your thoughts dwell too constantly upon Germany. Germany attempted this outrageous thing, but Germany was not the only country that had ever entertained the purpose of subjecting the peoples of the world to its will, and when we went into this war we said that we sent our soldiers across the seas not because we thought this was an American fight in particular, but because we knew that the purpose of Germany was against liberty, and that where anybody was fighting liberty it was our duty to go into the contest. We set this Nation up with the profession that we wanted to set an example of liberty not only, but to lead the world in the paths of liberty and justice and of right; and at last, after long reflection, after long hesitation, after trying to persuade ourselves that this was a European war and nothing more, we suddenly looked our own consciences in the face and said, 'This is not merely a European war. This is a war which imperils the very principles for which this Government was set up, and it is our duty to lend all the force that we have, whether of men or of resources, to the resistance of these designs.' And it was America—never let anybody forget this—it was America that saved the world, and those who propose the rejection of the treaty propose that, after having redeemed the world, we should desert the world. It would be nothing less.

"The settlements of this treaty can not be maintained without the concerted action of all the great Governments of the world. I asked you just now not to think exclusively about Germany, but turn your thoughts back to what it was that Germany proposed. Germany did direct her first force against France and against Belgium, but you know that it was not her purpose to remain in France, though it was part of her purpose to remain in Belgium. She was using her arms against these people so that they could not prevent what she intended elsewhere, and what she intended elsewhere was to make an open line of dominion between her and the Far East. The formula that she adopted was Bremen to Bagdad, the North Sea to Persia—to crush not only little Serbia, whom she first started to crush, but all the Balkan States, get Turkey in her grasp, take all the Turkish and Arabian lands beyond, penetrate the wealthy realms of Persia, open the gates of India, and, by dominating the central trade routes of the world, dominate the world itself. That was her plan; and what does the treaty of peace do? For I want you to remember, my fellow countrymen, that this treaty is not going to stand by itself. The treaty with Austria has now been signed; it will presently be sent over, and I shall lay that before the Senate of the United States. It will be laid down along exactly the same lines as the treaty with Germany; and the lines of the treaty with Germany suggest this, that we are setting up the very States which Germany and Austria intended to dominate as independent, self-governing units. We are giving them what they never could have got with their own strength, what they could have got only by the united strength of the armies of the world. But we have not made them strong by making them independent. We have given them what I have called their land titles. We have said, 'These lands that others have tried to dominate and exploit for their own uses belong to you, and we assign them to you in fee simple. They never did belong to anybody else. They were loot. It was brigandage to take them. We give them to you in fee simple.' But what is the use of setting up the titles if we do not guarantee them? And that guaranty is the only guaranty against the repetition of the war we have gone through just so soon as the German nation, 60,000,000 strong, can again recover its strength and its spirit, for east of Germany lies the fertile field of intrigue and power. At this moment the only people who are dealing with the Bolshevist government in Russia are the Germans. They are fraternizing with the few who exercise control in that distracted country. They are making all their plans that the financing of Russia and the commerce of Russia and the development of Russia shall be as soon as possible in the hands of Germans; and just so soon as she can swing that great power, that is also her road to the East and to the domination of the world. If you do not guarantee the titles that you are setting up in these treaties, you leave the whole ground fallow in which again to sow the dragon's teeth with the harvest of armed men.

"That, my fellow citizens, is what article 10, that you hear so much talked about in the covenant of the league of nations, does. It guarantees the land titles of the world; and if you do not guarantee the land titles of the world, there can not be the ordered society in which men can live. Off here in this beloved continent, with its great free stretches and its great free people, we have not realized the cloud of dread and terror under which the people of Europe have lived. I have heard men over there say, 'It is intolerable. We would rather die now than live another 50 years under the cloud that has hung over us ever since the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–71, because we have known that this force was gathering, we have known what the purpose was ultimately to be, we have known that blood and terror lay ahead of us, and we can not and will not live under that cloud any more.' America, my fellow citizens, is necessary to the peace of the world. America is absolutely necessary to the peace of the world. Germany realizes that; and I want to tell you now and here—I wish I could proclaim it in tones so loud that they would reach the world—

Germany wants us to stay out of this treaty. Not under any deception. Not under the deception that we will turn in sympathy toward her. Not under the delusion that we would seek in any direct or conscious way to serve Germany, but with the knowledge that the guaranties will not be sufficient without America, and that, inasmuch as Germany is out of the arrangement, it will be very useful to Germany to have America out of the arrangement. Germany knows that if America is out of the arrangement America will lose the confidence and cooperation of all the other nations in the world, and, fearing America's strength, she wants to see America alienated from the peoples from whom she has been alienated. It is a perfectly reasonable program. She wants to see America isolated. She is isolated. She wants to see one great nation left out of this combination which she never would again dare face. Evidences are not lacking—nay, evidences are abounding—that the pro-German propaganda has started up in this country coincidently with the opposition to the adoption of this treaty. I want those who have any kind of sympathy with the purposes with which we went into the war now to reflect upon this proposition: Are we going to prove the enemy of the rest of the world just when we have proved their savior? The thing is intolerable. The thing is impossible. America has never been unfaithful and she never will be unfaithful.

"Do not let anybody delude you, my fellow citizens, with the pose of being an American. If I am an American I want at least to be an intelligent American. If I am a true American I will study the true interests of America. If I am a true American I will have the world vision that America has always had, drawing her blood, drawing her genius, as she has drawn her people, out of all the great constructive peoples of the world. A true American conceives America in the atmosphere and whole setting of her fortune and her destiny. And America needs the confidence of the rest of the world just as much as other nations do. America needs the cooperation of the rest of the world to release her resources, to make her markets, above all things else to link together the spirits of men who mean to redeem the race from the wrongs that it has suffered. This western country is par excellence the country of progressiveism. I am not now using it with a big "P." It does not make any difference whether you belong to the Progressive Party or not; you belong to the progressive thought, and I hope every intelligent man belongs to the progressive thought. It is the only thought that the world is going to tolerate. If you believe in progress, if you believe in progressive reform, if you believe in making the lot of men better, if you believe in purifying politics and enlarging the purposes of public policy, then you have got to have a world in which that will be possible; and if America does not enter with all her soul into this new world arrangement, progressives might as well go out of business, because there is going to be universal disorder, as there is now universal unrest.

"Do not mistake the signs of the times, my fellow countrymen, and do not think that America is immune. The poison that has spread all through that pitiful nation of Russia is spreading all through Europe. There is not a statesman in Europe who does not dread the infection of it, and just so certainly as those people are disconcerted, thrown back upon their own resources, disheartened, rendered cynical by the withdrawal of the only people in the world they trust, just so certainly there will be universal upsetting of order in Europe. And if the order of Europe is upset, do you think America is going to be quiet? Have you not been reading in the papers of the intolerable thing that has just happened in Boston? When the police of a great city walk out and leave that city to be looted they have committed an intolerable crime against civilization; and if that spirit is going to prevail, where are your programs? How can you carry a program out when every man is taking what he can get? How can you carry a program out when there is no authority upon which to base it? How can you carry a program out when every man is looking out for his own selfish interests and refuses to be bound by any law that regards the interests of the others? There will be no reform in this world for a generation if the conditions of the world are not now brought to settled order, and they can not be brought to settled order without the cooperation of America.

"I am not speaking with conjecture, my fellow citizens. I would be ashamed of myself if upon a theme so great as this I should seek to mislead you by overstatement of any kind. I know what I am talking about. I have spent six months amidst those disturbed peoples on the other side of the water, and I can tell you, now and here, that the only people they depend upon to bring the world to settled conditions are the people of America. A chill will go to their heart, a discouragement will come down upon them, a cynicism will take possession of them, which will make progress impossible, if we do not take part not only, but do not take part with all our might and with all our genius. Everybody who loves justice and who hopes for programs of reform must support the unqualified adoption of this treaty. I send this challenge out to the conscience of every man in America, that if he knows anything of the conditions of the world, if he knows anything of the present state of society throughout the world and really loves justice and purposes just reform, he must support the treaty with Germany. I do not want to say that and have it proved by tragedy, for if this treaty should be refused, if it should be impaired, then amidst the tragedy of the things that would follow every man would be converted to the opinion that I am now uttering, but I do not want to see that sort of conversion. I do not want to see an era of blood and of chaos to convert men to the only practical methods of justice.

"My fellow citizens, there are a great many things needing to be reformed in America. We are not exempt from those very subtle influences which lead to all sorts of incidental injustice. We ourselves are in danger at this present moment of minorities trying to control our affairs, and whenever a minority tries to control the affairs of the country it is fighting against the interest of the country just as much as if it were trying to upset the Government. If you think that you can afford to live in a chaotic world, then speak words of encouragement to the men who are opposing this treaty, but if you want to have your own fortunes held steady, realize that the fortunes of the world must be held steady; that if you want to keep your own boys at home after this terrible experience, you will see that boys elsewhere are kept at home. Because America is not going to refuse, when the other catastrophe comes, again to attempt to save the world, and, having given this proof once, I pray God that we may not be given occasion to prove it again! We went into this war promising every loving heart in this country who had parted with a beloved youngster that we were going to fight a war which would make that sacrifice unnecessary again, and we must redeem that promise or be of all men the most unfaithful. If I did not go on this errand through the United States, if I did not do everything that was within my power that is honorable to get this treaty adopted, and adopted without qualification, I never could look another mother in the face upon whose cheeks there were the tears of sorrowful memory with regard to the boy buried across the sea. The moral compulsion laid upon America now is a compelling compulsion, and can not be escaped. My fellow countrymen, because it is a moral issue, because it is an issue in which is mixed up every sort of interest in America, I am not in the least uneasy about the result.

"If you put it on the lowest levels, you can not trade with a world disordered, and if you do not trade you draw your own industries within a narrower and narrower limit. This great State, with its untold natural resources, with its great undeveloped resources, will have to stand for a long generation stagnant, because there are no distant markets calling for these things. All America will have to wait a long, anxious generation through to see the normal courses of her life restored. So, if I were putting it upon the lowest conceivable basis of the amount of money we could make, I would say, 'We have got to assist in the restoration of order and the maintenance of order throughout the world by the maintenance of the morale of the world.' You will say, 'How? By arms?' That, I suspect, is what most of the opponents of the league of nations, at any rate, try to lead you to believe, that this is a league of arms. Why, my fellow citizens, it is a league to bring about the thing that America has been advocating ever since I was born. It is a league to bring it about that there shall not be war, but that there shall be substituted for it arbitration and the calm settlement of discussion. That is the heart of the league. The heart of the league is this: Every member of the league, and that will mean every fighting nation in the world except Germany, agrees that it will never go to war without first having done one or the other of two things, either having submitted the matter in dispute to arbitration, in which case it agrees absolutely to abide by the result, or having submitted it to consideration by the council of the league of nations, in which case it promises to lay all the documents, all the facts, in its possession before the council and to give the council six months in which to consider the matter, and, if it does not like the opinion of the council at the end of the six months, still to wait three months more before it resorts to arms. That is what America has been striving for. That is what the Congress of the United States directed me to bring about. Perhaps you do not know where; it was in an unexpected place, in the naval appropriations bill. Congress, authorizing a great building program of ships and the expenditure of vast sums of money to make our Navy one of the strongest in the world, paused a moment and declared in the midst of the appropriation bill that it was the policy of the United States to bring about disarmament and that for that purpose it was the policy of the United States to cooperate in the creation of a great international tribunal to which should be submitted questions of international difference and controversy, and it directed the President of the United States, not later than the close of this war, to call together an international conference for that purpose. It even went so far as to make an appropriation to pay the expenses for the conduct of such a conference in the city of Washington. And that is a continuing provision of the naval appropriations bill. When I came back with this covenant of the league of nations, I had fulfilled the mandate of the Congress of the United States; and now they do not like it.

"There is only one conceivable reason for not liking it, my fellow citizens, and to me as an American it is not a conceivable reason; that is that we should wish to do some nation some great wrong. If there is any nation in the world that can afford to submit its purposes to discussion, it is the American Nation. If I belonged to some other nations, there are some things that I know that I would not like to see submitted to the discussion of mankind, but I do not know anything in the present purposes of the United States that I would not be perfectly willing to lay upon any table of counsel in the world. In carrying out the mandate of the Congress, I was serving the age-long purpose of this great people, which purpose centers in justice and in peace.

"You will say, 'Well, why not go in with reservations?' I wonder if you know what that means. If the Senate of the United States passes a resolution of ratification and says that it ratifies on condition that so and so and so is understood, that will have to be resubmitted to every signatory of the treaty; and what gravels me is that it will have to be submitted to the German Assembly at Weimar. That goes against my digestion. We can not honorably put anything in that treaty, which Germany has signed and ratified, with Germany's consent; whereas it is perfectly feasible, my fellow countrymen, if we put interpretations upon that treaty which its language clearly warrants, to notify the other Governments of the world that we do understand the treaty in that sense. It is perfectly feasible to do that, and perfectly honorable to do that, because, mark you, nothing can be done under this treaty through the instrumentality of the council of the league of nations except by a unanimous vote. The vote of the United States will always be necessary, and it is perfectly legitimate for the United States to notify the other Governments beforehand that its vote in the council of the league of nations will be based upon such and such an understanding of the provisions of the treaty.

"The treaty is not susceptible of misunderstanding. I do not object to painting the rose or refining fine gold; there is not any phrase in the covenant of the league of nations that can legitimately be said to be of doubtful meaning, but if the Congress of the United States wants to state the meaning over again in other words and say to the other nations of the world, 'We understand the treaty to mean what it says,' I think that is a work of supererogation, but I do not see any moral objection to it. But anything that qualifies the treaty, anything that is a condition to our ratification of it, must be submitted to all the others, and we must go over this process again; this process which took six months of intensive labor, which took six months of very difficult adjustment and arrangement, which quieted jealousies, which allayed suspicions, which set aside controversies, which brought about the most extraordinary union of minds that was ever brought about in so miscellaneous an assembly, divided by so many interests. All that must be gone over again, and in the meantime the world must wait and its unrest grow deeper, and all the pulses of life go slower, waiting to see what is going to happen, all because the United States asks the other governments of the world to accept what they have already accepted in different language. That is all that it amounts to; I mean, all that the reasonable reservations amount to. Some of them amount to staying out altogether, some of them amount to a radical change of the spirit of the instrument, but I am speaking now of those which some men of high conscience and of high public purpose are seriously pressing in order that there may be no misunderstanding. You can avoid a misunderstanding without changing the document. You can avoid a misunderstanding without qualifying the terms of the document, because, as I have said and shall say again and again, America is at liberty as one of the voting members of the partnership to state how she understands the articles of copartnership.

"I beg that these things may sink in your thoughts, my fellow countrymen, because we are at a turning point in the fortunes of the world. Out upon these quiet hills and in these great valleys it is difficult sometimes for me to remember the turmoil of the world in which I have been mixing on the other side of the sea; it is difficult for me to remember the surging passions which moved upon the face of the other continents of the world; it is difficult for me to remember the infinite suffering that happened even in this beloved country; it is difficult for me to remember the delegations from weak peoples that came to me in Paris, figuratively speaking, with outstretched hands, pleading that America should lead the way out of the darkness into the light; it is difficult out here in this great peace for anybody, even, I dare say, for these fine fellows in khaki who were over there and saw something of it, to remember the whole strain and terror of the thing, but we must remember it, my fellow-citizens, and we must see to it that that strain and terror never come upon the world again. It is with this solemn thought, that we are at a turning point in the destinies of mankind and that America is the makeweight of mankind, that I, with perfect confidence, leave this great question to your unbiased judgment."

THE PRESIDENT AT SPOKANE, WASH., SEPTEMBER 12, 1919.

"Mr. Mayor, my fellow countrymen, I esteem it a real privilege to stand face to face with a representative audience of this great city, because I have come away from Washington, my fellow countrymen, not to make speeches but to get into contact with just such bodies of men and women as this, and feel that I have exchanged ideas with them, and with the utmost frankness of which I was capable. I have not come to paint pictures of the fancy. I have come to disclose to you what I understand to be facts, and I want so much as possible to get down to the very essence and marrow of the things that we are now talking about.

"I do not think I need tell you, my fellow citizens, that America and the world have come to the point where they must make one of the most critical choices ever made by great bodies of men or by nations. They have now to determine whether they will accept the one chance that has ever been offered to insure the peace of the world. I call it frankly a chance to insure the peace of the world. Nobody can guarantee the world against the ugly passions that sometimes get abroad. Nobody can engage that the world will not again go mad with blood; but I want to put it frankly to you: Though the chance should be poor, is it not worth taking a chance? Let men discount the proposed arrangements as much as they will; let us regard it as an insurance policy. If you could get 10 per cent insurance of your fortunes in respect of peace, wouldn't you rather take it than no insurance at all? As a matter of fact, I believe, after having sat in conference with men all over the world and found the attitude of their minds, the character of their purposes, that this is a 99 per cent insurance against war. If the nations of the world will indeed and in truth accept this great covenant of a league of nations and agree to put arbitration and discussion always first and war always last, I say that we have an immense insurance against war, and that is exactly what this great covenant does.

"I have found it necessary upon this trip, my fellow citizens—I have actually found it necessary—to tell great audiences what the treaty of peace contains. You never could divine it from the discussion of the men who are opposed to it. Let me tell you some of the things that this treaty does, apart from the covenant of the league of nations which stands by common consent of those who framed it at the beginning of it. Quite apart from the league of nations, it is the first attempt ever made by an international congress to substitute justice for national advantage. It is the first attempt ever made to settle the affairs of the world according to the wishes of the people in the parts of the world that were being dealt with. It is a treaty that deals with peoples and nations, and not with dynasties and Governments. Every representative of every great Government I met on the other side of the sea acknowledged, as I, of course, acknowledge, that he was master of nobody, that he was the servant of the people whom he represented, and that the people he represented wanted what the people of the United States wanted; they wanted a just and reasonable and permanent settlement, and that is what this treaty tried to give them. It substitutes for the aggression, which always was the beginning of war, a settled title on the part of the weak nations, along with the strong, to their own territories, a settled right to determine their own policies, a settled right to realize the national hopes so long suppressed, to free themselves from the oppression so long endured. Europe was full of people under the iron and relentless hand of military power, and that hand has been removed and crushed. This treaty is the means of doing it.

"The guaranty of this treaty is the part of the covenant of nations which you have heard most criticized. I mean the now celebrated article 10. Article 10 is an engagement of the most extraordinary kind in history. It is an engagement by all the fighting nations of the world never to fight upon the plan upon which they always fought before. They, all of them, agree to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the others, and they agree that if there should be any breach of that covenant, the council of the league shall advise what steps shall be taken to make the promises good. That is the covenant with which you have been frightened. Frightened, my fellow citizens? Why, it is the only possible or conceivable guaranty against the wars that have ravaged the world, because those wars have habitually begun by territorial aggression, by the seizure of territory that did not belong to the power that was effecting the seizure. How did this great war begin? It began by the invasion of Belgium, and it was admitted by all German statesmen that they never meant to get out of Belgium. By guaranteeing the territorial integrity of a country, you do not mean that you guarantee it against invasion You guarantee it against the invader staying there and keeping the spoils. The integrity is the title, is the ownership. You agree never to take territory away from the people to whom it belongs, and you agree never to interfere with the political independence of the people living in these territories whose titles are now made clear by a universal international guaranty.

"I want to discuss with you very frankly, indeed, just as frankly as I know how, the difficulties that have been suggested, because I say, not in the spirit of criticism, but in a spirit of entire intended fairness, that not one of the qualifications which have been suggested in this discussion is justified by the language of the instrument. Let me take them one by one. In the first article of the covenant of the league it is provided that any member State may withdraw from the league upon two years' notice, provided at the time of withdrawal it has fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant. Gentlemen object that it is not said who shall determine whether it has fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant or not. Having sat at the table where the instrument was drawn, I know that that was not by accident, because that is a matter upon which no nation can sit in judgment upon another. That is left to the conscience and the independent determination of the nation that is withdrawing, and there is only one jury that it need fear and that is the great embodied jury expressing the opinion of mankind. I want to differentiate myself, therefore, from the men who are afraid of that clause, because I want to record my feeling in the matter that, as an American, I am never afraid that the United States will fail to perform its international obligations; and, being certain that it will never fail in that respect, I have no fear that an occasion will arise when we need be sensitive to the opinion of mankind. That is the only jury set up in the case, and I am ready to go before that jury at any time. These gentlemen want to say what the instrument says, that we can withdraw when we please. The instrument does not say it in those words, but it says it in effect, and the only limitation upon that is that we should not please unless we have done our duty. We never will please, God helping us, to neglect our duty.

"The second difficulty—taking them in the order in which they have come in the covenant itself—is the article I was a moment ago discussing, article 10. Article 10, as I told you, says that if the promise to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the member States is broken, then the council shall advise what is to be done. I do not know any but one meaning for the word 'advise.' I have been very curious and interested to learn how many other meanings have been put into it. I, in my surprise, have looked in the dictionary to be sure I was not mistaken, and so far as I can find out 'advise' means 'advise.' And more interesting than that, the advice can not be given without the affirmative vote of the United States. There must be a unanimous vote of the council before there is advice, and the United States is a member of the council by the constitution of the league itself, a member now and always a member, so that neither the United States nor any other country can be advised to go to war for the redemption of that promise without the concurrent affirmative vote of the United States. Yet I hear gentlemen say that this is an invasion of our sovereignty. My fellow citizens, if it is anything, it is an exaggeration of our sovereignty, because it puts our sovereignty in a way to put a veto on that advice being given to anybody. Our present sovereignty merely extends to making choice whether we will go to war or not, but this extends our sovereignty to saying whether other nations shall go to war or not. If that does not constitute a very considerable insurance against war, I would like somebody to write a provision which would; because, at every point, my fellow citizens, the position of these gentlemen who criticize this instrument is either that they do not understand the covenant or that they can suggest something better, and I have not heard one of them suggest anything better. In fact, I have never heard any of them suggest anything. If the world is going to be at peace, it must be this or something better, and I want to say again it is a case of 'put up or shut up.'

"Let me make a slight digression here, if I may, to speak about a matter of some delicacy. I have had a great many men say to me, 'I am a Republican, but I am in favor of the league of nations.' Why the 'but.' I want to tell you, my fellow citizens, that there is one element in this whole discussion which ought not to be in it. There is, though I say it myself, an element of personal bitterness. One would suppose that this covenant of the league of nations was first thought of and first invented and first written by a man named Wilson. I wish it were. If I had done that, I would be willing to have it recorded that I had done that and nothing else. But I did not do it. I, along with thousands of my fellow countrymen, got the idea 20 years ago, chiefly from Republican public men. Take men like ex-Senator Burton, of Ohio. He has been preaching a league of nations for 20 years. I do not want to mention names, because I do not want to record gentlemen against themselves, but go through the list and you will find most of the leading, thinking minds on the Republican side in favor of this very kind of thing, and I want to remind every Republican of the criticism that he and his comrades have usually made of the Democratic Party, and the boast that they have generally made of their party. They said that the Democratic Party was a party of negations and not a party of constructive policies, and that the Republican Party was a party of constructive policy. Very well, then, why that 'but.' 'I am a Republican, but I am in favor of the greatest constructive thing that has ever been suggested!' If I were a Republican, I would say, 'I am a Republican and therefore I am in favor of a league of nations.' My present point is to dissociate the league of nations from the present speaker. I did not originate it. It is not my handiwork. It has originated out of the consciences and thought of men who wanted justice and loved peace for generations, and my relationship to it is just what my relationship ought to be to every public question, the relationship which a man bears to his fellow citizens when he tries to interpret their thought and their conscience. That is what I conceive to be my part in the league of nations. I did have a part in some of the phraseology, and every time I did it was to carry out the ideas that these gentlemen are fighting for.

"For example, there is one part of the covenant, the principal part of it, where it speaks of arbitration and discussion, where it provides that any member State, failing to keep these particular covenants, shall be regarded as thereby ipso facto to have committed an act of war against the other members. The way it originally read was, 'Shall thereby ipso facto be deemed at war with the other members,' and I said, 'No; I can not agree to that. That provision would put the United States at war without the consent of the Congress of the United States, and I have no right in this part of the covenant or any other to assent to a provision which would deprive the Congress of the United States of its free choice whether it makes war or not.' There, and at every other point in the covenant where it was necessary to do so, I insisted upon language which would leave the Congress of the United States free, and yet these gentlemen say that the Congress of the United States is deprived of its liberty. I fought that battle and won it. It is not necessary for them to fight it over again.

"You will say, 'It is all very well what you say about the vote of the United States being necessary to the advice provided the United States is not one of the parties to the dispute. In that case it can not vote.' That is very true; but in that case it has got the fight on its hands anyhow, because if it is one of the parties to the dispute the war belongs to it. It does not have to go into it, and therefore it can not be forced by the vote of the United States in the council to go into the war. The only thing the vote can do is to force it out of the war. I want to ask you to think what it means when it is suggested that the United States may be a party. A party to what? A party to seizing somebody else's territory? A party to infringing some other country's political independence? Is any man willing to stand on this platform and say that the United States is likely to do either of those things? I challenge any man to stand up before an American audience and say that that is the danger. 'Ah, but somebody else may seek to seize our territory or impair our political independence.' Well, who? Who has an arm long enough, who has an authority great enough, to try to take a single inch of American territory or to seek to interfere for one moment with the political independence of the United States? These gentlemen are dreaming of things that can not happen, and I can not bring myself to feel uneasy in the presence of things that I know are not so. The great difficulty in this discussion, as in so many others, is in the number of things that men know that are not so.

"'But the Monroe doctrine.' I must admit to you, my fellow citizens, I do not know how the Monroe doctrine could be any more explicitly accepted than it is in the covenant of the league of nations. It says that nothing in the covenant shall be interpreted as impairing the validity of the Monroe doctrine. What more could you say? I did try while I was in Paris to define the Monroe doctrine and get it written into the document, but I will confide to you in confidence that when I tried to define it I found that it escaped analysis, that all that you could say was that it was a principle with regard to the interference of foreign powers in the politics of the Western Hemisphere which the United States felt at liberty to apply in any circumstances where it thought it pertinent. That is not a definition. That means that the United States means to play big brother to the Western Hemisphere in any circumstances where it thinks it wise to play big brother. Therefore, inasmuch as you could not or would not define the Monroe doctrine—at least I would not, because I do not know how much we may want to extend it—what more could you say than that nothing in that instrument shall impair the validity of the Monroe doctrine? I tell you, my fellow citizens, that is the most extraordinary sentence in that treaty, for this reason: Up to that time there was not a nation in the world that was willing to admit the validity of the Monroe doctrine. I have made a great many speeches in my life, perhaps too many, but I do not think that I ever put so much of what I hope was the best in me as I put in the speech in the conference on the league of nations in favor of the Monroe doctrine, and it was upon that occasion that it was embodied. And we have this extraordinary spectacle, of the world recognizing the validity of the Monroe doctrine. Yet these gentlemen seem to want something more. What more could you get? Shall we get them to express their belief in the deity of the Monroe doctrine? They accept it for the first time in the history of the world, and they say that they will do nothing that will interfere with it. I must submit that it is absolutely irrational to ask for anything more.

"'But there is the question of somebody interfering with the domestic policies of the United States—immigration, naturalization, tariffs; matters of that sort. There, again, I can not understand or feel the weight of the difficulty, because the covenant says that if any international difficulty is brought under discussion and one of the parties claims and the council finds that it is a matter of domestic jurisdiction, the council shall cease to discuss it and shall make no report about it. The only way you could make the document more clear would be by enumerating the domestic questions you had in mind. Very well. I ask any lawyer here if that would be safe? Might you not be in danger of leaving out something? Might you not be in danger of not mentioning something that would afterwards become important? The danger of making a list is that the mention of the things you do mention constitutes the exclusion of the things you do not mention. Inasmuch as there is no dispute of any authoritative students of international law that these matters that we are most concerned about—immigration, naturalization, tariff, and the rest—are domestic questions, it is inconceivable that the council should ever seek to interfere with or to discuss such questions, unless we had ourselves deliberately made them matters of international agreement, and even the opponents of the league admit they would be suitable and proper subjects for discussion.

"Those are the matters upon which they are talking about reservations. The only reservations I can imagine are reservations which say over again what the covenant itself says in plain language, and make it necessary that we should go back to Paris and discuss new language for things that we all have to admit, if we are frank, are already in the document.
